DRAFTBOOK'S 21st Year!

MAGAZINE CODE 68421

BILL ROBERTSON
Editor/Managing Writer

This time last year, in this very space, I commented on the vast numbers of us playing fantasy football.

Go ahead and consider our numbers vaster.

In case you missed it, numbers released by the Fantasy Sports Trade Association (FSTA) in June of 2015 indicated fantasy sports participation in the United States and Canada has reached the 56.8-million mark. That number represented a nearly 40 percent increase over the totals reported in 2014.

And the latest word?

According to the latest FSTA data, our ranks expanded to 57.4 million in 2015. This is the highest number of players recorded in the history of the organization's research. The record number of players represents a growth rate of 15 percent over the last two years.

Look. If you're reading this magazine, chances are you're into the game. You get it. You understand the things that make fantasy sports -- and fantasy football in particular -- so appealing.

That combination of testing and proving your acumen and expertise against like-minded individuals; being able to take an understanding of your sport of choice and its personnel to the next level; the interaction with league mates and other competitors; the associated trash talking and bragging rights that come with success; the satisfaction that comes from small victories, whether on the waiver wire or in making lineup decisions; and perhaps most importantly, the great pleasure that comes from an enhanced connection to the sports we already love.

For those of us into the football version of fantasy sports, ever-increasing diversity in the way we play the games has added to the fun.

While Daily Fantasy Sports has been a huge factor in the overall growth of the hobby, the FSTA still attributes much of the ongoing popularity of the season-long format, as 82 percent of players still play season-long fantasy sports. When it comes to football, the evolving variations within the season-long game have kept things interesting.

You'll find said variation on full display on page 3 of this year's DraftBook as 25 well-known fantasy professionals all share their top tools and tricks with you via Brandon Marianne Lee. If you were of the opinion your regular re-draft league was the only option, this article will quickly and completely disabuse you of that notion.

With the full range of possibilities in season-long including (but not limited to) standard scoring leagues, point-per reception (PPR) leagues, Dynasty and keeper formats, Two-QB and SuperFlex leagues, Individual Defensive Player leagues, high-stakes, auction drafts and best-ball leagues, I'll remind you there's even diversity within DFS with cash games like head-to-heads and 50-50s requiring much different strategies than GPP (Guaranteed Prize Pool) and tournament play.

With all of variations requiring different (or at least nuanced) approaches, the need for information on and analysis of these strategies becomes increasingly important.

Oh. And between the DraftBook and its online companion, FootballDiehards.com, we have all that covered.

As always, you'll find the usual assortment of articles, rankings and associated goodies right here in the 2016 DraftBook, with our panel of fantasy professionals being the driving force behind the content. The DraftBook Experts Poll offers position-by-position rankings displayed for each panel member with consensus rankings at each position. We also ask all 12 panelists to provide their sleeper and bust picks then have our in-house crew, led by Gary Davenport, review their boldest picks to assist you in determining which of their inputs might be best suited to meeting your needs.

We also include a Mock Draft with pick-by-pick analysis to give you further insight into the strategy and thought process of each of them bring to the table.

Taking the diversity of the game a step further, we had Alex Miglio look into the ways that daily strategies can assist you with your season-long game and vice versa. Flip to page 8 to see what he found. Beyond that, we cover all the major aspects that are common to all formats: Identifying value on both sides of the ball; getting a jump on strength of schedule; and a full range of player stats, including snap-count data, target data and red-zone numbers.

Of course, all of the information contained on these pages will help you build the baseline of information needed heading into training camp, the exhibition season and into the regular season. We add to that by offering you full access to our online information found at FootballDiehards.com. Simply use the Access Code found directly below this letter to sign up for you free access!

TRICKS OF THE TRADE
From People Who Know

Brandon Marianne Lee, Pro Football Focus and Her Fantasy Football

You see these guys and gals on television, hear them on the radio, read their articles and you wonder, "How do they know this stuff? Where do they get this information?" Well, Fantasy Football Draftbook has you covered. Here are detailed answers to your burning questions. Listen up! You will certainly learn something.

Season-Long Leagues

KC Joyner
@KCJoynerTFS
Senior Fantasy Football Insider, ESPN

When stockpiling wide receivers in PPR leagues, the key number to remember is 15. That is how many points per game are typically necessary to place a wide receiver into the top 30 at that position in most fantasy weeks. Being in the top 30 is key because many leagues have at least 10 teams and three starting wide receiver spots, so having a wideout in a lineup who doesn't place in the top 30 means that that player did not provide starter-quality points. Getting to that point level on a consistent basis is not an easy thing, and many upper-tier wideouts have trouble posting 15 or more points in PPR leagues even 50 percent of the time. Fantasy owners who can find consistent 15-point producers at wide receiver will give themselves a significant matchup edge each week.

John Paulsen
Senior Editor, 4for4.com

We have plenty of great tools at 4for4 to help fantasy owners gain an edge, but one of my favorites is the RBBC Report. It provides a snapshot of the number (and percentage) of snaps, touches, yardage, touchdowns and fantasy points for any given backfield, helping owners to better identify what's really going on in a committee. For example, last year in Cincinnati, Jeremy Hill out-touched Giovani Bernard 238 to 203, but Bernard actually played more snaps (583 to 459) and outscored Hill 181 to 168 in PPR formats. Meanwhile, in Green Bay, James Starks out-snapped Eddie Lacy by two percent, though Lacy led in touches 207 to 191. During the season, the report is updated weekly and users can look at a two- or four-week span, or simply see the season-to-date numbers.

Matthew Freedman
@MattFtheOracle
Editor-in-Chief of FantasyLabs and Producer of the RotoViz and Fantasyland podcasts

For DFS research, I use the tools at FantasyLabs. For season-long leagues, I use RotoViz' apps, my favorite of which is the Projection Machine, through which you can create custom projections using a variety of historical data. For instance, if you want to create projections for the 2016 49ers, you can build projections based on the production, run/pass ratio, and pace of Chip Kelly's previous NFL offenses; the efficiency and consistency of players in Kelly's system; the tendencies of players likely to play for the 49ers this year; and much more. In creating projections and sorting through data, you quickly notice trends that enable you to find value in your drafts. As an example: Torrey Smith has been a WR2 each year of his career except for 2015, and Kelly's top wide receivers tend to be no worse than WR2s. Smith has a reasonable chance of being a WR2 this season, and right now he's valued around WR45 overall. I am likely to target Smith heavily in drafts – because of the Projection Machine.

Brad Evans
@YahooNoise

Though not foolproof, many secondary metrics can be a bellwether for determining a player's overall worth, particularly at the RB position. When used in conjunction with game tape, beat writer rundowns and general scouting reports, unique measurements calculated by sites like Football Outsiders, Pro Football Focus and Pro Football Reference are invaluable. In particular, yards after contact (YAC) and tackles avoided per attempt (TA/ATT) offer excellent insight into a RB's potential. Last time I checked, plowing through would-be tacklers and making them miss are fundamental to successful running. For example, this year many fantasy drafters are skittish about Melvin Gordon. To most, being J.J. Watt's personal tackling dummy sounds more appealing than rostering the rusher. That feeling is understandable based on a cursory look at last year's numbers. His 3.5 yards per carry and zero touchdowns were major eyesores. However, peel back the curtain and a different player is revealed. His 2.2 YAC (No. 24 among RBs) and 0.18 TA/ATT (No. 8) were quite respectable. Throw in what many assume will be an improved San Diego o-line – it only has one direction to go – quality passing attack and limited competition for touches, and Gordon is a bargain at his mid-60s ADP (RB26).

Dynasty Leagues

Eric Olinger
@OlingerIDP
Senior Writer, dynastyleaguefootball.com

When preparing for a dynasty draft I rely on two things, and they're from the same person: Ryan McDowell's mock drafts and monthly ADP data. These show recent trends and have enough data to form a general opinion on a player's current value amongst the dynasty community. It's always nice knowing you can possibly wait one more round for "your guy" instead of having to reach.

Karl Safchick

@KarlSafchick

Co-Owner, dynastyonefantasy.com and Co-Host of the Dynasty One Podcast

The greatest single tip I can give in any fantasy format, especially in dynasty – understand your league settings, your rules and your opponents. In a 10 team 1QB league, a quarterback is almost unnecessary until the final rounds. In a 16 team superflex league (a league in which you can start multiple quarterbacks) you can make an argument that 10 or more of the first-round picks should be signal callers. If you can work the waiver wire without consequences, you may want to take more chances in your draft. You could consider drafting players with more "upside" because you can always cut them loose. If you're in a league with minimal waiver wire activity, you probably want to draft players who you think you can use throughout the season. These are mere examples of how fantasy leagues can differ, but the "trick" isn't a trick at all. Studying the league settings and using your superior familiarity with them, will give you the single greatest advantage in your fantasy leagues this year.

Raphael Rabe

@RealTalkRaph

Co-Founder, Rotoballer.com

Dynasty leagues are a tad different than standard leagues in regards to player valuation, both long-term and for the coming season. I like to focus my research on a few key factors that differ by position. For quarterbacks, I look for an established and proven veteran who is not too old or too expensive to own (i.e. Andy Dalton). For wide receivers, I try not to overpay for rookies but instead prioritize second-year breakout candidates (i.e. Breshad Perriman) and undervalued guys who may emerge into larger roles in their offenses (i.e. DeVante Parker). Running backs are the trickiest to value in dynasty leagues because of the high turnover year to year in the NFL. I start by looking at their prior year's usage, both in the passing and running game, to try to determine who has the most all-around value. In the preseason, looking at depth charts will help give you an idea of who may have a primary role out of the backfield. But when it's all said and done, you want to target guys who play behind good offensive lines and who have a track record of staying on the field. Not having a ton of mileage on them (i.e. Jeremy Hill) is a positive sign as well.

High Stakes

Chris Vaccaro

@ChrisVaccaroGST

2014 NFFC Hall of Fame Inductee

Playing in the High-Stakes world of fantasy football is as challenging as it gets. When preparing for your drafts you are looking for every possible piece of information that you can find in the offseason. You know that every opponent at that table with you on draft day is coming in well prepared, and you're hoping that your research and prep work exceed theirs -- leading you to the edge you need to come out on top of that league. Before you can win your league and cash a nice big check, you must put the time in studying the teams, players, coaching changes, and offensive schemes to see the players that you want to target on draft day. Once you have done that, one of the biggest tools we are afforded in the high stakes world is an ADP list (average draft position). This list is made up of all pre-season drafts that we do and allows us to form a plan based on where the high stakes owners value players heading into this coming year. The final step is putting a draft plan together and jumping the competition on draft day for the players you feel will exceed their ADP and leaving the players on the board that you feel will underperform their draft spots.

Eric Balkman

@EricBalkman

Host, High Stakes Fantasy Football Hour Podcast and Media Relations Officer, Fantasy Football Players Championship

I can't remember the last time I enjoyed a high stakes draft without the Footballguys Draft Dominator. No matter the format, league, roster size or scoring system, I'm always able to customize everything and run as many mocks as I want prior to draft time. And since I hate having to lug my computer with me, the fact that I can get everything on the Dominator mobile app makes it all the more appealing. While I always go with my gut, it's always nice having the opinions of the entire Footballguys staff at my disposal as well, especially when I am torn or need to make a quick decision. Many years ago, I gave the Dominator a try, and I haven't looked back – it should be a must-have for all high stakes players.

Scott Atkins

@ScottFantasy

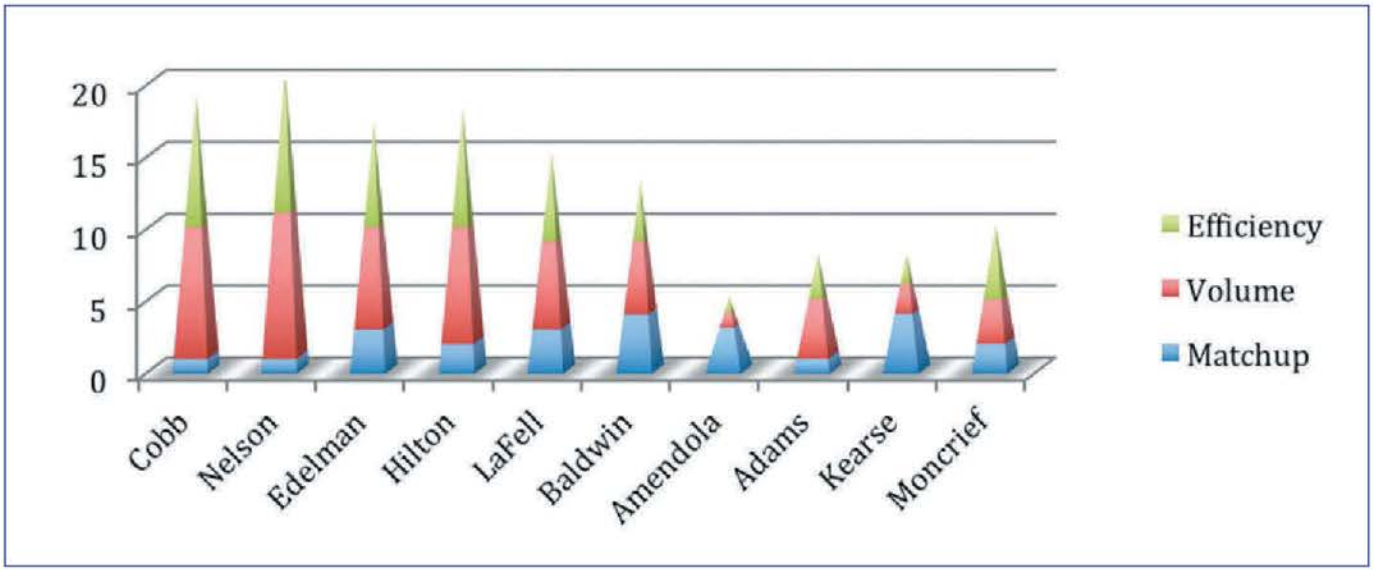
Everybody comes prepared on draft day, but which tools you decide to bring to the table can determine a winning or losing outcome on the season. Take for instance everybody's favorite, ADP or Average Draft Position. When you prepare for your draft, don't trust the standard ADP reports commonly found, ones that encompass mock drafts and inexperienced drafters. Make sure you're using money-league ADP tables, such as the one offered at Scout. The target round discrepancies can mean success or failure when trying to landing that coveted sleeper of yours on draft day. For example, if you want to take a shot at a sleeper PPR machine like Cleveland's Duke Johnson, standard ADP suggests he can be found at pick 85 so you might think to target him in the seventh round of your fantasy draft, but in money leagues, he's going at an average draft position of pick 74, a full round earlier than expected. Remember, there are 11 losers in every league. Arm yourself with the right tools on draft day and come out on top.

Daily Fantasy Contests

Renee Miller
@reneemiller01
Writer for ESPN, Rotoworld, Fantasy Insiders

As a scientist, it's my job to collect evidence to support or refute my ideas. It's no surprise that I carry that motivation into my fantasy football strategy. There are three pieces of evidence that I rely on in particular when deciding between options at any given position: volume, efficiency, and matchup. Volume is simply passes attempted, receiving targets, or rushing attempts, which I bin and assign a score to. For efficiency, I like ProFootballFocus.com's fantasy points per opportunity metric, where opportunities are dropbacks for quarterbacks, and rushes/targets for running backs or receivers. Lastly, I assign a matchup score to a player based on a combination of ESPN.com's fantasy points allowed by position and ProFootballFocus.com's grades for the opposing team's pass defense, run defense, and/or secondary. Different factors can be weighted differently week to week and by position. For instance, a high volume receiver facing a lock down secondary might be a losing proposition, but even a really inefficient quarterback can rake against the leagues' worst pass defenses. The chart below is an example from last year's Wild Card weekend of how I represent this graphically—my preferred method of side-by-side comparison.



Dennis M. Esser
@coachesser
Founder of coachesser.com, Host of The Fantasy Coach Podcast

Coming from a season-long fantasy football background combined with poker and game theory skills, I was ready to dip my toes in NFL DFS, but to make the leap to playing more contests and different types of contests I had to learn some DFS-specific skills. The best tool that I use for NFL DFS is Excel. I took an advanced Excel Course a little over four years ago to help me become more productive with my research (vlookups, pivot tables, graphs, etc.). I highly recommend spending the time to learn how to use Excel for your research. My favorite part of my sheet for NFL DFS is my price history line graphs for each and every player. It gives me a picture of how their pricing has been adjusted from week to week and then when I see a player's price has dropped significantly and has an easy opponent that week I can click on my player tab to see my notes on why the player's price is dropping. Less usage (snaps/targets), lingering injury, QB Play, etc. This why the DFS game sometimes looks like it comes easy to some people with a background in finance and accounting.

Austin Lee
@AustinNFL
Writer and Podcaster, FootballGuys and RotoGrinders

You need a tool that tracks player exposure. Whether you're building three lineups or three hundred lineups, it's important to adjust the percentage of your total entry fees invested in each player. I use Footballguys' Daily Crusher app to calculate cross-site exposure while on the go. If you don't track exposure, you'll stray from your goals as you generate more lineups. You might not be aware you put so many "eggs" in one basket until you see an injured running back carted out of 80 percent of your lineups and into the locker room. Or maybe your sleeper picks had career games, but you only added them to a few of your rosters. Either scenario is a punch in the gut. Avoid these pitfalls. Be strategic about how much you invest in each player. And make it easy on yourself by using a tool like Footballguys' Daily Crusher.

One of the tricks to winning tournaments in daily fantasy is pairing your QB with one or two of his receivers to maximize points. The logic behind this is similar to that in season-long fantasy leagues – if your QB goes off, the WRs will have to be the beneficiaries, so pairing them up would make sense. A more advanced strategy regarding this in daily fantasy tournaments would be to not only pair your QB and WR but also to own the most explosive WR from the other team. To give an example: If the Steelers are playing the Bengals and you love the Ben Roethlisberger/Antonio Brown combo, it would make 100 percent sense to also add A.J. Green to your team in tournaments. The reason for this is because if Ben and AB go crazy in the first half, Pitt should have 21-28 first half points, meaning Cincy will need to throw to come back (and you now have A.J. in a position where he should see a ton of targets). For it to be one of those 45-37 games, Cincy will need to score, and A.J. will have to be a part of that. To sum it up, my favorite DFS tournament move is to pair my QB with his No. 1 WR from the same team, along with the most explosive WR from the opposing team, to maximize points.

IDP (Individual Defensive Player)

Ross Miles

@RossMilesNFL

Lead Writer at ProFootballFocus

When it comes to IDP leagues people are often daunted by the prospect of all the extra players and the use of defensive stats, but it's quite easy to cut through a lot of the noise with just two handy stats – a player's snap count, and their tackles per opportunity (tPOP). It's fairly obvious why a player's snap count is important – it dictates how much time he is on the field, and therefore has a strong bearing on whether a player can record fantasy-relevant statistics. Make sure players referred to as "three-down" and "every-down" are firmly on your radar. As for tPOP, it's an efficiency statistic that measures how often a player records a tackle when they have an opportunity to do so, discounting plays when a player cannot possibly record a tackle, such as an incomplete pass. Focusing on how efficient a player is at recording tackles is a much more accurate measure of their fantasy potential than just using their cumulative tackle totals. At the end of 2014, for example, it highlighted 2015 breakout LB Telvin Smith as a player to watch as he ranked sixth in tPOP as a rookie.

Gary Davenport

@IDPSharks

NFL/Fantasy Analyst, Bleacher Report and IDP Senior Staff Writer, Fantasy Sharks

There are any number of resources that can be of use to IDP owners when doing research for their fantasy drafts. Of course, there are the standard rankings and projections (available from any number of sources, including at Fantasy Sharks). But that's just the tip of the iceberg. Taking a glance at player stats can give you an idea (as an example) about which defensive linemen and defensive backs post higher tackle numbers, which generally means steadier fantasy production. A glance at snap counts (available at some advanced stat sites and in the individual gamebooks at NFL.com) can offer a glance into which linebackers play in subpackages, which is invaluable when gauging their IDP value. As an aside, once we move into training camp several IDP sites (including Fantasy Sharks) offer articles on "three down" linebackers if you don't feel like doing the legwork yourself. Be sure to avail yourself of the strategy tips, sleeper articles, etc. released by the IDP community, too. Whether it's myself and Walton Spurlin at Fantasy Sharks or folks like Jene Bramel (FootballGuys) or Ryan Sitzmann (The IDP Guru) there's more IDP info available online and on social media than ever before. Use it. Knowledge is power.

Chris Heil

Host of the Fantasy Sports Rants Podcast

When it comes to IDP leagues there is one tool that overshadows the rest. It's the IDP matchup analyzer on Footballguys.com. This tool allows you to generate several different specialized reports. It will show you who is more consistent as a 3-4 OLB or 4-3 LB. You can also generate reports to look at certain weeks to see if there are any developing trends that others haven't identified yet.

MFL 10s

C.D. Carter

@CDCarter13

Owner of DraftDayConsultants.com, Author of How to Think Like A DFS Winner, Co-Host of Living the Stream Podcast

It's important to stock up on high-floor, reliable receivers and running backs in the early going of an MFL10, but it's in the middle and late rounds that I gravitate toward volatile players who deliver fantasy points in (often unpredictable) spasms of yardage and touchdowns. While guys like DeSean Jackson, Tyler Lockett, Torrey Smith, Jared Cook, and Mike Wallace can be nightmares in re-draft leagues, they can prove to be relatively cheap contributors in best-ball formats. Every one of those players will have giant weeks in 2016. They'll also have a bunch of flubs.

Matt Harmon

@MattHarmon_BYB

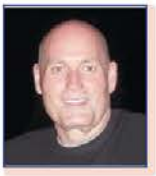
Creator of Reception Perception and Writer, NFL.com and Footballguys.com

While MFL10s are one of the newest and most exciting formats sweeping the fantasy football world, in many ways they help me "go back to basics" in playing the game. Given that I start playing them incredibly early in the offseason, the most important MFL10 creed I follow is prioritizing "what we know" and maximizing the information I take in. To that end, I'm more conservative when it comes to selecting players who have question marks in their profile than I will be in August in my traditional redraft leagues. While the best-ball format directs us to be aggressive and invite more variance, the lack of waivers and in-season trades should also give us pause when considering a risky player. This is especially true when it comes to players embroiled in training camp position battles and those battling injuries. I don't totally avoid them, but I am more cautious and I constantly scour the web for news during MFL10 season. Following Rotoworld, beat writers and other analysts on Twitter is always essential, but even more important in the early stages of MFL10s.

Corey Parson
@TheFantasyExec
Fantasy Football Analyst, Scout.com

These 20-round best-ball drafts normally have some of the top names in the fantasy football industry playing in them, everyone eager to turn 10 bucks into 100. I'm talking to that crew. Follow me for a quick rundown of how to maximize your 20 draft picks. Let's start at quarterback: I like to use three of my 20 picks on the quarterback position. You obviously should be drafting a starting quarterback and a backup to protect against injuries and bye weeks, and adding a third QB for insurance. This season I like Broncos rookie Paxton Lynch as that third quarterback. Running backs fly off the board early and often in these drafts. With no waivers during the season it is important to make sure you lock up your handcuffs. That being the case, plan on using seven of your 20 roster spots on running backs. I like to use six of my roster spots on receivers. Draft whichever receivers you like, but in this format – and only in this format – I like to draft guys like DeSean Jackson and Tavon Austin, players who aren't very consistent but with lineups based on production (and finalized after the week's games are complete) you can benefit from those games where they do blow up and throw away those games where they disappear. Tight end is normally a position I try to find value. I use two of my MFL 10 roster spots on tight ends. This year guys like Martellus Bennett, Charles Clay and Vance McDonald are all going after Round 13. Grab two defenses before it gets too late, or you'll find yourself having to roll with the Saints' and/or Bucs' Defense. MFL10 owners don't roster kickers; that's my favorite part of these ultra-fun fantasy football leagues.

2 QB Leagues



Bob Harris

So when it came to my initial experience in a two-QB (or super-flex) league, the approach might have best been summed up by Bill Paxton's character in the sci-fi flick "Edge of Tomorrow," when he (repeatedly) explained to Tom Cruise, "Battle is the Great Redeemer. It is the fiery crucible in which true heroes are forged." More to the point, I dive into two-QB play with both feet and little forethought. It's safe to say I learned a hard lesson in the importance of landing QBs early. And often. And earlier. And oftener. ... The initial whupping I took led to considerable mock drafting in the format before my next foray. And that would be the approach I recommend. Mock until you drop. And did I mention the whole "early and often" thing with regard to landing your quarterbacks? The bottom line is this: Relying on ADP data or rankings from traditional formats to draft in two-QB leagues will lead to disaster. Doubling the active QB pool not only makes acquiring both of your starters in the early rounds vital, but also realize that not every team (in 12-team leagues) is going to have a viable No. 3.

Scott Fish
@ScottFish24
Sr. Writer/Developer for dynastyleaguefootball.com and Commissioner of scottfishbowl.com

When I'm jumping into a 2QB league I reference several different works from great members of the fantasy industry. Last year a new site came on the scene called TwoQBs.com. Their rankings and articles are incredibly helpful in helping me prepare. I also check out the 2QB rankings and articles at Dynasty League Football. Through these two sources I've learned that you can still successfully employ a late round quarterback strategy even in a 2QB league. The 2QB fantasy content from these two sources help me determine how to properly value quarterbacks in a format that really emphasizes the position. Another thing I do is set up mock drafts and tell the people participating to treat the mock as if it were a 2QB league. This helps me get a real idea of where players get drafted in this format.

Use a tiered cheat sheet! I use one for every draft that I do, but they are vital in 2QB leagues because basic fantasy know-how gets put on its head. I aim for back to back QBs in the third and fourth tier. This year I'm hoping for Rivers and Carr or Cousins. Then I pick a boring, but safe, third option for bye weeks. In other words, I'll take Alex Smith (a boring, but unquestioned starter) late in the draft over a Mark Sanchez-type with breakout potential. You simply cannot expect to be able to pick up ANYONE, so pick someone who will at least get you some guaranteed points.

Listen to the people who watch the games! That's right. When asked about tools for drafting, I say make sure you listen to people who watch the friggin' games. At FantasyAlarm.com, all our analysts watch all the games. You cannot get analysis from people who only look at the numbers. For my drafts, I only need one product to help me play SMART, the FantasyAlarm.com Draft Guide. SYSTEM: All 32 teams are covered with every coaching system and every offensive line broken down and ranked. MANAGEMENT: Every relevant player is ranked so that you can make your own rankings. No kidding, do NOT rely on someone else's rankings. Make your own. You like a player, move him up your list. Use the rankings to manage the draft only. AGE: Younger players are simply more durable. The Draft Guide details all the young players and has specific columns on second and third year WRs. RESERVES: The Draft Guide has a special grid telling you which players are necessary to handcuff and which aren't. TALENT: When faced with a decision, take the more talented player.

Daily Tactics Aren't Just For Daily Players

Using DFS To Raise Your Season-Long Game

Alessandro Miglio, Footballguys.com

The dawn of the daily fantasy age has been the subject of much joy and consternation. The fun of it all has been usurped by the chase for money and specter of government intervention.

It has also revolutionized the way we play fantasy football.

Daily fantasy has quite the learning curve for anyone looking to get serious and profit. We're not here to help anyone along that curve – check out Brandon Marianne Lee's piece for a little something on that (page 4) – but what can we glean about DFS practices that could help us in season-long leagues? There is plenty to learn from the nascent industry.

Price, Price, Baby

Player tiers are nothing new in the fantasy football realm. We do it all the time – there are four Tier-1 quarterbacks followed by seven in Tier 2, etc. – and to great effect.

Pricing tiers in DFS are a little bit different.

For the uninitiated, FanDuel gives contestants a $60,000 salary cap with which to construct a roster of nine players. This particular week quarterbacks accounted for anywhere between eight and 15 percent of any given team's budget for that particular game.

Interestingly enough, the top 20 salaries for Week 17 were tightly grouped at quarterback. They ranged from $6,900 to $9,100, averaging $7,855 with a standard deviation of $638. Why does all that math mean anything here? Simply put, it shows us just how interchangeable the quarterback position can be from a season-long standpoint.

Let's look at it from a different perspective. Cam Newton averaged nearly 25 PPG at FanDuel last season, a huge number. But the average PPG for the top 20 quarterbacks based on Week 17 salary was 19.5. That number is 20.9 for the top 10 quarterbacks.

It's all rather elementary, and it's just another way of saying what we already know – the quarterback position is the opposite of top-heavy, featuring many guys who can get the job done on your roster for far less draft capital than what it would cost to draft Newton or Andrew Luck.

This is a quick look at the quarterback position at FanDuel for Week 17. Indeed, while the traditional fantasy football realm was basking in the glow of ultimate victory or smoldering in the ashes of defeat, DFS was going strong.

Looking at other positions, however, bears out different results. Here is a snapshot of the running back position for the same Week 17 slate.

At first blush, the running back position is simply less expensive. Perhaps there is something to the Zero RB strategy after all. When you look at each player's starting salary for the season, Zero RB steps out of the shadow of legend and right onto your doorstep.

Some of the differences in salary between Week 1 and Week 17 are astounding. The very first name on the list – Devonta Freeman – saw his salary soar as he took off early in the season and left Tevin Coleman in the dust. On the flip side, early-round guys like LeSean McCoy and Eddie Lacy saw their salaries plummet as the season wore on, disappointing fantasy owners everywhere in the process.

And that doesn't mention the laundry list of players not shown – Le'Veon Bell, Jamaal Charles, Justin Forsett, Arian Foster and Carlos Hyde, to name a few, who would wind up hurting early-round investors to varying degree by virtue of season-ending injuries.

Neuroplasticity

We all agonize about which backup running back to start while our starter is on a bye or out with injury. Inevitably, we are like Sex Panther – 60 percent of the time we are wrong every time. The rest of our lineup, though. ...

How can that help us in seasonal leagues?

What if I told you there was more to lineup decisions than making a choice between guys you drafted in the 13th and 16th rounds 10 weeks ago?

Is starting Kamar Aiken in Week 14 against the Pittsburgh Steelers over T.Y. Hilton against the Denver Broncos a good idea? Would you seriously consider benching Demaryius Thomas in Week 3 because of a bad matchup?

One thing DFS forces players need to do is think outside the box. With only so much cash on hand to spend on any given lineup, choices become more difficult. Do you roll with a "boom or bust" lineup using two or three high-priced studs, or do you balance things out? The answer to that lies, in part, with what kind of contest you are entering, but that is a conversation for another time.

The rub here is malleability – you become accustomed to starting players you would normally never consider in season-long leagues. Even when going with a more balanced lineup, tough salary decisions force us to look beyond the obvious and dig deep for fantasy production.

The Expendables

If there is one thing weekly fantasy football conditions us to do, it's to treat players as interchangeable parts. Moral implications of that statement aside, daily fantasy teaches us to let go of our biases and embrace radical change.

If you subscribe to a streaming philosophy, you have already embraced it. Riding a wave of quarterbacks or tight ends rather than spending a high draft pick is a high-risk, high-reward prospect that few dare attempt.

While DFS is the ultimate "streaming" game – you do pick new players every week, though I suppose you could try to stick with a similar team every week for some godforsaken reason – you're not generally making wholesale changes to your season-long roster every week. But just how much should you hold onto those guys on your bench?

Some owners make hundreds of transactions a year, but many of us – including yours truly – have a tendency to play it safe, riding the waiver wire for more obvious pickups or to get us through byes and injuries. But what if we were a bit more fluid with our benches? What if we didn't hang on to that second quarterback for half the year or dropped that underperforming running back instead of holding out hope he'll turn things around?

Don't be afraid to restructure your team – even early in the season. Once there is enough data to start making real decisions – usually after a couple of weeks – use some of the other tools DFS gives us to scout ahead or make bold decisions.

Diversifying Your Portfolio

What are the odds you are reading this because you field just one fantasy football team a year? If you do, this section is not for you.

Chances are fantasy football is a big deal in your life, and that means multiple fantasy leagues. Even if it's just two, more teams means more opportunities to draft players.

Mock drafts can create somewhat of an anchoring bias. You identify guys you like who are regularly falling to certain rounds, and you tend to draft those guys more often than not. Unless you end up at opposite ends of drafts when your league drafts roll around, those guys stick out.

For successful DFS players, that bias is nonexistent. Or, at the very least, it's buried.

Mitigating exposure is paramount to long-term success in the DFS realm. Typically, players enter multiple contests, perhaps even hundreds or thousands on any given slate of games. Those lineups can't have too much exposure to particular players – if those players flop or get injured, your lineups will quickly get behind the eight ball.

In the case of season-long leagues, drafting teams that are halfway identical could be disastrous. If you targeted Dez Bryant and DeMarco Murray last season, the teams that had those two on the roster were in trouble early. Lamar Miller could – and should – be rather tempting in the second round of every draft, but one false step could drop a bomb on all of your fantasy teams.

Vegas Knows

Vegas odds are some of the biggest tools that DFS players use on a weekly basis to help make lineup decisions. Why? Quite simply, Vegas knows.

That doesn't mean Vegas is always right, mind you – even the best oddsmakers can get bamboozled by a surprise performance by Nick Foles. What the odds do tell us is where Vegas thinks teams will land in terms of scoring. For example, a seven-point favorite in a game Vegas pegs with a 55-point over-under generally means the favorite is going to score a ton of points.

As DFS players pore over the lines when they are released every week, so can season-long players inject some modicum of predictability into their magic eight balls. Approach week-to-week decision-making to maximize potential output from their lineups.

Stacking Your Team

Ideally you want to have a stacked team, but that's not what we're talking about here.

Stacking – when you draft multiple players from the same team, sometimes at the same position – is a pillar of DFS success. It takes the concept of betting on team success to the next level. Teams that score more real points score more fantasy points.

While it's certainly not a good idea to put all your chickens into one basket, stacking could be a major key to season-long success. That is, of course, unless you're stacking the Cleveland Browns' offense.

Pulling it off is the tricky part. Going with a stacking strategy takes some luck, and you shouldn't bend over backwards to try to accomplish the feat. In other words, don't draft Ladarius Green five rounds higher than his average draft position (ADP) just because you are trying to pair him with Antonio Brown and Ben Roethlisberger.

So which offenses are the most stackable?

Arizona Cardinals

Overall	Round	Player	Position Rank
7	1	David Johnson	RB 3
54	5	Michael Floyd	WR 25
62	6	Larry Fitzgerald	WR 28
69	6	John Brown	WR 32
83	7	Carson Palmer	QB 9
154	13	Chris Johnson	RB 52
195	17	Andre Ellington	RB 64
211	18	Chandler Catanzaro	PK 6

Nabbing pass-catching savant Johnson in the first round and complementing him with Fitzgerald or Floyd along with Palmer sounds like a lot, but this is one of the best passing offenses in the league on a team that scored 489 points last season.

New England Patriots

Overall	Round	Player	Position Rank
8	1	Rob Gronkowski	TE 1
42	4	Julian Edelman	WR 21
50	5	Dion Lewis	RB 19
76	7	Tom Brady	QB 7
119	10	LeGarrette Blount	RB 43
168	14	Stephen Gostkowski	PK 1
187	16	Chris Hogan	WR 69

The trouble with this one is – barring a Hail Mary court appeal actually happening – the entire offense could be stuck in second gear for the first four games of the season. The good news is that Brady's likely absence is depressing everyone's value except Gronkowski. Buying into a perennially potent offense playing angry could be a boon.

Incidentally, Gostkowski and Hogan were left in on purpose. Don't draft a kicker until the end of the draft, but he is a great option if you have an opportunity to take him late. Hogan, meanwhile, is this year's OTA darling.

Cincinnati Bengals

Overall	Round	Player	Position Rank
11	1	A.J. Green	WR 6
51	5	Jeremy Hill	RB 20
56	5	Tyler Eifert	TE 4
74	7	Giovani Bernard	RB 28
103	9	Andy Dalton	QB 15
188	16	Tyler Boyd	WR 70

The Bengals continue to field one of the more underrated offenses in the league. A year after scoring the seventh-most points in the league in spite of A.J. McCarron's unfortunate call to action after Andy Dalton's injury, only A.J. Green is getting proper respect. Touchdown machine Tyler Eifert's ADP has plummeted since news broke that he needed surgery on his ankle, but he should be back early. Giovani Bernard is a post-hype sleeper in PPR leagues, and Dalton is once again overlooked despite being 11th in fantasy PPG last season.

New Orleans Saints
Overall	Round	Player	Position Rank
25	3	Brandin Cooks	WR 14
27	3	Mark Ingram	RB 11
64	6	Drew Brees	QB 6
75	7	Coby Fleener	TE 7
114	10	Willie Snead	WR 46
157	14	Michael Thomas	WR 58

Do you trust Coby Fleener? Ben Watson garnered 124 targets as a 34-year-old castoff last season, so it stands to reason New Orleans' big free-agent signing will have a big year.

Missed the Cut

Unfortunately, one of the most potent offenses isn't really a candidate for the list. There are two Steelers regularly going in the top-3 of fantasy drafts – Le'Veon Bell and Antonio Brown. Naturally, you won't be able to get them both in snake drafts, and the combo might be too pricey in auctions.

The same could be said about the Packers' offense, which currently has Jordy Nelson, Eddie Lacy, Aaron Rodgers and Randall Cobb all going in the second or third round on average.

There are naturally some offenses to try to avoid for similar reasons.

Cleveland Browns

There is some buzz building around second-year running back Duke Johnson, and Gary Barnidge had one of the more unexpected fantasy breakouts last season. But this is a team stuck in quarterback purgatory, one that scored just 278 points last season. We'll see some big games out of those two, but there is likely to be too much inconsistency here to heavily invest in players from Cleveland.

San Francisco 49ers

Los Angeles Rams

Aside from stud running back Todd Gurley, there isn't much to like about the St. Louis offense. Rookie Jared Goff isn't exactly expected to light the NFL on fire for a team that scored just 270 points last season, and Tavon Austin is good for about two solid fantasy outings a year at this stage. Perennial hype-monger Jared Cook isn't even around to trick us anymore.

Evaluating The Schedule Can Help You Make Tough Decisions

Jody Smith, GridironExperts.com

QUARTERBACKS

In today's pass-happy NFL, we're seeing unprecedented offensive numbers. An influx of talented young players and rule changes that put defenders at a disadvantage have the record book getting rewritten seemingly every season.

Entering 2016, the deepest position in fantasy football is at quarterback. There are enough strong fantasy producers to give each squad in a 12-team league at least two quality passers. This depth at the position is why quarterbacks, as important as they might be, are beginning to slide down the ADP charts as more fantasy owners wait to draft their signal-callers.

Evaluating the strength-of-schedule for quarterbacks can help fantasy drafters make tough decisions amongst a group that appears to be as closely-grouped as it is deep.

Favorable Schedule

Tony Romo (Cowboys) – Romo hasn't played a full 16-game schedule in three years, but remains a top-10 fantasy talent when healthy. Before his abbreviated 2015 season, Romo averaged 21+ fantasy points per game in eight straight seasons, and put up stellar stats that approached 4,300 passing yards and 30+ touchdown tosses when projected over a 16-game slate. For 2016, Romo will enjoy the league's easiest schedule for quarterbacks, which includes two games each against the Giants (31st), Eagles (30th) and Redskins (24th), and matchups against the Browns (27th), Steelers (26th), and Bears (23rd.)

Eli Manning (Giants) – Overlooked every season, just like Tony Romo, Manning is an outstanding value in fantasy drafts this season. Manning has finished as the seventh- and eighth-ranked fantasy signal-caller over the past two seasons, and should be in line for another strong campaign with Ben McAdoo now the head coach, and the team adding some new weapons in the draft. Even more appealing, the Giants have the No. 2 schedule for fantasy quarterbacks in 2016, including two games each against the Eagles (30th) and Redskins (24th), and contests with the Saints (32nd), Browns (27th), and Steelers (26th). The icing on the cake? New York faces the Lions (21st) and Philadelphia (30th) during the fantasy playoffs.

Matthew Stafford (Lions) – Stafford looked revitalized once new offensive coordinator Jim Bob Cooter became the primary play caller. In Detroit's final five games, Stafford threw 17 touchdowns and only one interception. It won't be as easy for Stafford to maintain those stellar numbers with the retirement of star wide receiver Calvin Johnson, but the eight-year pro does inherit the league's third-easiest schedule for quarterbacks, including a fantastic run to end the season. Starting in Week 13, the Lions play the Saints (32nd), Bears (23rd), Giants (31st) and end the fantasy season with a Week 16 primetime game against a Dallas secondary that appears to be vulnerable and ripe for a decline.

Unfavorable Schedule

Drew Brees (Saints) – I'm not suggesting you avoid drafting Brees, who has been a top-7 fantasy QB in each of the past 11 seasons, but there are some signs that an inevitable battle against father time is becoming a factor. First, Brees has seen his passing yards and touchdown passes decline in each of the last four seasons, and at 37 years old, those number are unlikely to rebound. Also, New Orleans has the toughest 2016 schedule for quarterbacks, including games against the Broncos (1st), Seahawks (2nd), Chargers (12th) and two games each against the Falcons (8th) and Panthers (4th.) Drew Brees will most likely remain a strong fantasy QB1, but is a prime candidate to be overdrafted.

Tom Brady (Patriots) – Tom Brady looks like a very volatile fantasy pick in 2016, as a candidate to be both overdrafted and under drafted. As good as Brady is, showing no signs of a decline and with an improved supporting cast, the threat of a four-game suspension still looms over the 17-year veteran. Should that suspension take place, Brady's ADP will tumble, making him an outstanding value pick, as he should return to action on a mission to right a perceived wrong. However, whether he plays 12 games or all 16, the Patriots have a challenging schedule for their quarterbacks, ranking 31st out of 32 teams. That schedule includes an intimidating fantasy playoff run, with the Broncos (1st) in Week 15 and the Jets (5th) in championship week.

Russell Wilson (Seahawks) – 2015 was a breakout year for Wilson and the Seattle passing game, and the retirement of RB Marshawn Lynch bodes well for the group's 2016 prospects. However, looking at the schedule, Wilson ends the fantasy season with a pretty rough slate of games, including matchups against the Panthers (4th) in Week 13, at Green Bay (9th) in Week 15, and facing the Rams (11th) and Cardinals (7th) at home to end the year.

RUNNING BACKS

Since so many teams have adapted a pass-first philosophy, three-down running backs have become scarce. More and more teams are entering the dreaded running back-by-committee approach, and each season seems to offer up fewer and fewer 1,000 yard rushers.

With so many teams utilizing multiple running backs, it becomes harder to judge just how well opponents are limiting the run, and the few bell-cow backs that remain in the league become even more valuable.

Having a strong run defense can be deceptive, as many teams have poor secondaries which leads their opponents to abandon their rushing attack in favor of exploiting a more glaring weakness in the secondary.

Still, it's important to consider a defense's ability to limit, or stop a running game when looking at the growing group of Tier 2 and Tier 3 fantasy running backs. That knowledge can help you make the right choice when dissecting the growing number of backfield committees.

DEFENSES VS RB

1	Seattle Seahawks	17	Oakland Raiders
2	New York Jets	18	Washington Redskins
3	Pittsburgh Steelers	19	Cleveland Browns
4	Kansas City Chiefs	20	St Louis Rams
5	New England Patriots	21	Indianapolis Colts
6	Baltimore Ravens	22	Detroit Lions

8	Minnesota Vikings	24	Jacksonville Jaguars
9	Arizona Cardinals	25	New York Giants
10	Houston Texans	26	Dallas Cowboys
11	Carolina Panthers	27	Atlanta Falcons
12	Denver Broncos	28	Philadelphia Eagles
13	Cincinnati Bengals	29	San Diego Chargers
14	Tampa Bay Buccaneers	30	New Orleans Saints
15	Green Bay Packers	31	San Francisco 49ers
16	Buffalo Bills	32	Miami Dolphins

Thomas Rawls (Seahawks) – Based solely on 2015 numbers, the Seahawks' opponents this upcoming season surrendered an average of 18.9 standard fantasy points per game to opposing running backs – the highest in the league. In the games that Rawls received double-digit carries, he averaged 17.7 fantasy points per contest in standard scoring. As long as he fully recovers from an ankle injury that ended his 2015 season, Rawls looks primed to be a solid RB1 in 2016.

Doug Martin (Buccaneers) – Overall, the Tampa Bay Buccaneers have a fairly tough 2016 schedule. The good news for Bucs fans is that they have an outstanding running back and face the second-easiest fantasy schedule against the run. Tampa's opponents surrendered an average of 18.7 fantasy points to opposing rushers. Armed with a new five-year deal, Martin should be in good position to maintain his fantasy value and gets a superb late-season slate of games that includes matchups with bottom-10 run defenses from San Diego in Week 13, Dallas in Week 15, and two games against a Saints' defense in Weeks 14 and 16 that was the second-worst unit in the league last year.

Ezekiel Elliott (Cowboys) – Widely considered one of the best NFL running back prospects to enter the league since Adrian Peterson, the Cowboys used the No. 4 pick in the 2016 NFL draft to select the former Ohio State standout. No doubt Jerry Jones will want his new acquisition to shine immediately, so Elliott should be given plenty of opportunities to star behind the Cowboys' elite offensive line. Dallas also has a very fantasy-friendly schedule for their freshman rusher, featuring opponents that gave up 18.6 fantasy points per game to opposing running backs, which ranked as the fourth-most in the NFL.

Unfavorable Schedule

Jay Ajayi (Dolphins) – Rumors have circulated all offseason that new head coach Adam Gase isn't sold on Ajayi's ability to be a lead back. Ajayi was drafted by Miami's previous regime, while Gase chose to select Kenyan Drake, who has the chance to carve out an immediate role, in the third round. However the Miami backfield shakes out, they'll have their work cut out for them, as the Dolphins face the league's toughest schedule for running backs, including fantasy playoff matchups with the Jets (2nd) and the Bills (10th.)

Frank Gore (Colts) – As bad as things went for the Colts' offense last season, Gore actually had a solid year, finishing as the No. 14 running back in standard scoring. Gore's 2016 ADP is so low, and the Indianapolis staff did so little to acquire competition for Gore's job, that he remains a solid value pick this year. That said, the Colts face the second-most difficult schedule for running backs, so while the Indy offense is a great bounce-back candidate as a whole, Gore, 33, is likely to be a volatile RB2.

LeSean McCoy (Bills) – McCoy was limited to 12 games last season but remains a valuable fantasy asset on the RB1/RB2 radar. However, McCoy is likely to lose more carries to emerging second-year teammate Karlos Williams, especially around the goal line. The Bills' 2016 schedule also ranks as fifth-toughest in the league and includes games with Seattle (1st), the New York Jets (2nd), Pittsburgh (3th) and Baltimore (6th.)

WIDE RECEIVERS

The transition to wide open and spread offenses in both pro and college football has led to an influx of talented pass-catchers in the NFL. While three-down running backs have become nearly extinct, it's not at all unusual for an NFL team to boast multiple elite wideouts.

With the rules now favoring the passing game and an ever-increasing pool of talented prospects to choose from, it's no wonder that wide receivers have become the hottest, and most valuable, commodities in fantasy football.

It's also become harder for the defenses to shut down offenses in this era, and the few teams that can consistently limit passing games with a strong secondary have become the most likely to remain playoff contenders from season to season.

When evaluating strength of schedule in your fantasy draft, accounting for how your squad's opponents rank versus the pass is the most important factor to consider, as a strong secondary can limit both quarterbacks and wide receivers, the two most important commodities in fantasy football.

Favorable Schedule

Markus Wheaton (Steelers) – After Pittsburgh's Week 11 bye last year, Wheaton began to emerge in the Steelers' passing game. In Pittsburgh's final six contests, Wheaton caught 28 balls for 476 yards and four touchdowns – that's a 75-1,269-11 pace when projected over a 16-game run. That's probably not a realistic expectation for Wheaton this year, but the season-long suspension of Martavis Bryant means Wheaton is the favorite for the role opposite superstar Antonio Brown. Brown, Wheaton and Sammie Coates also have the league's best schedule for wide receivers, as Pittsburgh's 2016 opponents allowed the most points to opposing wide receivers. The schedule also features nine game against opponents who were in the bottom-10 against the pass last season.

A.J. Green (Bengals) – Playing in the secondary-challenged AFC North could help push A.J. Green into the very top-tier of fantasy wideouts this season. Already an elite fantasy option, Green could emerge as a top-3 scorer this year as the Bengals funnel even more passes his way due to injuries to Tyler Eifert and the receiving corps being dismantled in free agency. Cincinnati also has the No. 2 schedule for wide receivers, including games with Eagles (32nd), Redskins (28th), Bills (23th) and two each versus the Browns (31st), Steelers (30th) and Ravens (29th.)

Dez Bryant (Cowboys) – In early 2016 drafts, Bryant is regularly falling into the top of the second round as the sixth or seventh wideout off the board, but with the return of a healthy Tony Romo, the arrival of a blue chip running back prospect, and a fantasy-friendly schedule, Bryant could join A.J. Green as contenders to Antonio Brown's title as the top wide receiver in fantasy football. The Cowboys have the No. 3 schedule for wide receivers this season, and if you're somehow still playing in Week 17, you'll really love a matchup against a Philadelphia Eagles secondary that ranked dead last in the NFL last season.

Unfavorable Schedule

Mike Evans (Buccaneers) – After a stellar rookie campaign, Evans regressed a bit in 2015, leading the league in drops (15) while also dropping from 12 to three touchdown receptions. With Evans in better shape and reportedly working out extensively with sophomore QB Jameis Winston, we can expect the touchdown numbers to rebound, but Evans has a daunting schedule this year, which includes Denver (1st), Seattle (3rd), Los Angeles (4th), San Diego (5th), Arizona (7th), and two games against Atlanta (2nd).

Jeremy Maclin (Chiefs) – The Chiefs have very little established talent behind Maclin in their receiving corps. Until another wide receiver emerges in Kansas City, Maclin will be the primary focus for opposing secondaries. With Kansas City playing in the AFC West, that means the Chiefs and Maclin will twice see the top-ranked secondary from Denver, a top-5 Chargers' group, and an improving unit from Oakland. The Chiefs also have the toughest fantasy playoff schedule of any team. Starting in Week 12, Kansas City plays the Broncos (1st) and Falcons (2nd), and ends the fantasy season in Week 16 with a rematch with Denver.

Kelvin Benjamin (Panthers) – After a strong rookie campaign in 2014, Benjamin missed his entire sophomore season with a torn ACL. As the Carolina passing game really emerged last season under Cam Newton, expectations are sky high for Benjamin to return, fully-healthy, to fantasy dominance. But it could take a while for Benjamin to acclimate himself back into the new-look Panthers' passing attack, and Carolina also faces the 28th-ranked 2016 schedule for opposing wide receivers. Just in time for the fantasy playoffs, the Panthers' schedule really gets very imposing, as the team plays Seattle (3rd) in Week 13, the Chargers (5th) in Week 14, a Redskins secondary that just signed Josh Norman in Week 15, and the Falcons (2nd) to end the year.

TIGHT ENDS

No position in fantasy football has seen a more dramatic shift in value than the tight end. A handful of years ago, tight ends were used more as in-line blockers who ran few routes. Most tight ends were essentially third offensive tackles, valued more for their blocking prowess and rarely called upon to run any downfield passing routes.

The transition to more athletic, "move" tight ends has dramatically changed the profile for the position, and as speed, hands and route-running have become more important than every-down blocking abilities, tight ends have become a dangerous part of many teams' offensive game plans.

In fact, several teams regularly utilize two tight end, or "12" sets, as part of their regular offense. This means there are even more options across the league, and more choices to consider on fantasy draft day.

Rob Gronkowski is still head-and-shoulders the top tight end to grab, but after Gronk, it's a rather crowded group to choose from. Evaluating the strength of schedule for the position can be a valuable tool in helping make the right decision for your fantasy squad on draft day.

Favorable Schedule

Travis Kelce (Chiefs) – Armed with a new, five-year contract, Kelce enters his third season ready to stake his claim as the No. 2 tight end in 2016 drafts. The Chiefs play the league's easiest schedule based on 2015 numbers when it comes to defending tight ends. Kansas City plays the Saints (32nd), Falcons (30th), and twice against the Raiders (29th), all teams that finished in the bottom-5 defending the position last year. All in all, the 16 opponents on Kansas City's 2016 schedule allowed an average of 82 receptions, 910 yards and nearly eight touchdowns to opposing tight ends – easily top-5 fantasy numbers – and Kelce offers an ascending skill set and exceptional durability.

Greg Olsen (Panthers) – The 31-year-old Olsen offers many of the same positive attributes as Kelce but with an even better track record for consistent production and an impressive streak of durability. Not only has Olsen seen more targets in each of the last six seasons, he has suited up in all 16 games for an incredible eight straight NFL campaigns. He's also finished as a top-7 fantasy tight end in each of the last four seasons. Expect another stellar year from the 10th-year veteran in 2016, as the Panthers have the second-easiest schedule for tight ends, including two games against the hapless Saints (32nd), a matchup with the Raiders (30th) and two against the Falcons (28th) including a crucial home game in Week 16, better known in most leagues as your Championship matchup.

Jason Witten (Cowboys) – Witten is a great late-round target in your fantasy draft. Despite putrid quarterbacking from Dallas last season, Witten still commanded over 100 targets – a number he has exceeded in eight of the past nine seasons. He also didn't drop a single pass all season and is a wonderful bounce-back candidate with the return of a healthy Tony Romo under center for the Cowboys. If that's not enough, the Cowboys' fantasy playoff schedule from Weeks 14-16 is the best in the league for tight ends. Dallas closes out the fantasy season with matchups against the Giants (31st), Buccaneers (9th) and Lions (29th) on championship week.

Along with the other two NFC South starting tight ends, New Orleans' Coby Fleener and the Buccaneers' Austin Seferian-Jenkins also have top-5 fantasy schedules, but their roles aren't clearly defined. That makes them both desirable, but risky investments. Green Bay's Richard Rodgers scored eight touchdowns last season and now inherits a very fantasy-friendly schedule as well.

Unfavorable Schedule

Ladarius Green (Steelers) – After showing strong big-play ability acting as Antonio Gates' understudy, Green signed a four-year deal to replace the retired Heath Miller in Pittsburgh's high-octane offense. Green immediately became a highly-coveted fantasy commodity, but the Steelers have the league's toughest 2016 schedule for tight ends. Come fantasy playoff time in Weeks 14-16, the Steelers play games against the Bills (7th), Bengals (18th) and Ravens (4th) who, combined, only allowed 11.4 PPR-points and 0.23 touchdowns per game to opposing tight ends last season.

Tyler Eifert (Bengals) – Eifert led all tight ends with 13 receiving touchdowns in 2015, despite missing three games. In his three pro seasons, Eifert has only played in 60 percent of the contests, making him a big injury risk. Before 2016 even begins, Eifert is already on the shelf after off-season ankle surgery. If that's not enough to scare you away, consider Cincinnati's schedule. The Bengals have the NFL's fourth-worst schedule for tight ends this year, including two games in the fantasy playoffs against top-10 squads in Cleveland (14th) and Houston (13th.)

Gary Barnidge (Browns) – After seven inconspicuous seasons, Barnidge broke out in 2015 becoming one of the league's feel-good surprise stories, but don't count on another stellar season in 2016. First, the Browns usher in yet another new regime with a new coaching staff, new offense and a new analytics-driven approach. There's no guarantee that any of last season's offense will carry over into the new year. Also, the Browns have the 28th ranked schedule for tight ends this year, including matchups with Dallas (2nd), the New York Jets (3rd), New England (5th), and a pair of games versus division-rival Baltimore (4th.)

TRUMPING THE COMPETITION

Undervalued Players Who Will Make Your Fantasy Team Great Again in 2016

By Gary Trumpenport, Fantasy Sharks

I've had a great deal of success playing fantasy football. In fact, I've won every league I've ever participated in. In double-extra fact, I've never even lost a weekly matchup. My career record is 3,544-0. My career winnings in DFS games is $7,427,638,132.08. Give or take. I'd show you proof, but I'm being audited.

How have I done it? How have I been able to win so bigly? To become the greatest fantasy football player ever and the bestest fantasy writer since that guy who wrote about the Habbits? (Hobbits, whatever – I hate books) Well, first off, I'm very modest and open-minded. Second, I'm always right about everything. And second again, I have a great brain and the best words. I use only the most luxurious players – five-star fantasy kings with silk underwear and laser eye beams.

Kidding aside, I know that it's hard to think about taking anyone seriously who talks or writes like that (no, really – think about how hard it is to take anyone seriously who talks or writes like that), but I have actually had a fair amount of success playing fantasy football. And that's because I know the magic word – and it certainly isn't "bigly."

The magic word in fantasy football is value – getting players at a cost lower than the level of production they go on to post that season.

Granted, this is a speculative art. After all, no matter how undervalued a player might seem heading into a season that player still has to justify that belief. They still have to go out there and outperform their draft slot. Otherwise your fantasy squad will wind up bankrupt – four times.

OK, I'll stop now. It's almost time for my spray tan anyway.

As you prepare for your fantasy drafts this summer, bear these players in mind – a "starting lineup" of undervalued stars who all have a solid chance at providing excellent value in 2016.

The kind of value that will make your fantasy team great again.

(Average Draft Position Data Courtesy of My Fantasy League)

Philip Rivers – QB, San Diego Chargers (ADP: QB14, Round 11)

Sure, Rivers' 12th-place finish in NFL.com default fantasy scoring last year doesn't exactly scream "weekly starter." But that down year was largely due to Rivers screaming lots of other things thanks to losing wide receiver Keenan Allen to a lacerated kidney. Not only does Rivers get Allen back in 2016, but the Bolts also added a vertical threat in free agent Travis Benjamin – an addition Rivers raved about while speaking to the UPI. "Not that we're just going to heave him a bunch of deep balls," Rivers said. "But the threat that he can run by you, it makes for a lot of easy 10- or 12-yard completions." No quarterback attempted more passes last year than Rivers, who has top-5 upside for a QB2 price.

Matt Forte – RB, New York Jets (ADP: RB17, Round 4)

Forte told NJ.com he's eager to see how he'll be used on his new team by OC Chan Gailey. "I'm looking forward to getting back into having a fullback, a lead blocker, a power-type running game," Forte said. "I see myself being used the same way I've always been used in my entire career, in the passing game and in the run game." Yes, Forte is the wrong side of 30 and his 898 rushing yards last year were a career low. But the ninth-year veteran still managed over 1,200 total yards and a RB7 fantasy finish in PPR formats in 2015. It's simple, really – if you think Forte will break down, stay away. If you think he'll stay on the field, he's a steal at this spot.

Ameer Abdullah – RB, Detroit Lions (ADP: RB29, Round 7)

Yes, Abdullah's rookie season was a disappointment. And much like me when a fellow "league mate" talks smack (how DARE she call me mentally unstable! I'll sue!) many fantasy owners are holding a grudge. A grudge wherein Jim Sannes of NumberFire sees opportunity. "We need to be able to recognize when these biases exist," Sannes said, "because they have the potential to create overcompensation. It appears as if that's what we're seeing with Abdullah, and it's time to start buying him as a result." Abdullah played better down the stretch in 2015, and while Theo Riddick will siphon some third-down work Stevan Ridley doesn't scare me. I'm calling my shot – Abdullah finishes in the top 20 at his position.

Larry Fitzgerald – WR, Arizona Cardinals (ADP: WR30, Round 7)

It's somewhat understandable that Fitzgerald is being drafted as a WR3. He is, after all, well the wrong side of 30 and coming off a terrible season in which he set a career high with 109 catches, topped 1,200 yards, scored nine touchdowns and finished among the top-10 fantasy receivers in leagues that award a point for receptions. Frankly, I don't see why fantasy owners are even wasting a pick at all on the has-been. I mean it's not like five years after he retires Fitz will wind up in the Hall of Fame. Or that he plays for an Arizona team with a prolific passing attack. What a bum.

Marvin Jones – WR, Detroit Lions (ADP: WR41, Round 9)

Now that Calvin Johnson has returned to Cybertron (friggin' Optimus Prime just couldn't leave him alone. Damn you, Michael Bay!) someone is going to have to emerge as the go-to receiver for Matthew Stafford. Most seem to think it will be Golden Tate, who led the Lions in catches last year. However, even if that happens Mike Clay of ESPN sees big-time value to be had with Jones. "Jones is in position for an every-down role in a pass-heavy offense that figures to finish near league average in scoring," Clay said. "Even if he plays an expected second fiddle to Tate, Jones will see enough volume to allow Borderline WR3 production in 10-team leagues." If Jones surpasses Tate as the go-to guy? How does the top 20 sound?

Tavon Austin – WR, Los Angeles Rams (ADP: WR47, Round 10)

Rams head coach Jeff Fisher sees a "YUUUGE" season for Austin in 2016 – as in 100+ catches huge. Austin allowed to the Los Angeles Daily News that may be wishful thinking, but he's looking forward to a larger role this year. "I don't think he means 100 catches," Austin said, smiling. "That's hard to do. This is the NFL. Anytime your coach says he wants to get the ball in your hands more, that's great." Austin topped 900 total yards in 2015 and finished as a top-25 fantasy option in standard-scoring systems thanks to his rushing ability. If the Rams are serious about getting Austin the ball more this season, his floor is a solid WR3. His ceiling is much higher. All for the price of a low-end fantasy WR4.

Zach Miller – TE, Chicago Bears (ADP: TE20, Round 14)

Jeff Dickerson of ESPN expects Miller to be one of the Bears' biggest surprises in 2016. "(Martellus) Bennett is a Pro Bowl-caliber talent, but Miller, when healthy, is equally dynamic," he said. "Miller is expected to be one of the team's top weapons in 2016. An added bonus is that Miller already has chemistry with quarterback Jay Cutler. If he can just avoid injuries, Miller is talented enough to put up big numbers." Last year, we watched Gary Barnidge of the Cleveland Browns come off the scrap heap at 30 years old and post top-5 fantasy numbers. The stars are aligning for Miller to accomplish a similar feat in 2016 at 31.

Justin Tucker – PK, Baltimore Ravens (ADP: K6, Round 18)

Personally, I find the notion of offering fantasy advice about kickers to be incredibly distasteful. They are a pimple on the butt of this fine pastime of ours, and drafting any kicker before the last round is just nuts. Almost as nuts as the fact that there are five kickers coming off the board before Tucker. Yes, Tucker finished 2015 a "meh" seventh in fantasy points at the position. But that had a lot more to do with the entire Baltimore offense being eaten by a giant carnivorous platypus (which is totally what happened – don't believe the media's lies) than Tucker himself. The Ravens are healthy offensively this year and should rebound as a whole, and that's going to mean more scoring opportunities for arguably the best placekicker in football. Wait until the last round, grab him and thank me later. Preferably with cash.

Philadelphia Eagles Defense/Special Teams (ADP: DEF11, Round 13)

Despite the fact that the Philadelphia Eagles finished as a top-5 fantasy defense each of the past two seasons (including a No. 1 finish in 2014), the team is being chosen as a back-end starter in 12-team fantasy leagues. Sure, the Eagles weren't that good in terms of points or yardage allowed last year, and there's a scheme change afoot in Philly in 2016. But that scheme change is taking place under the tutelage of Jim Schwartz, who has crafted defenses in both Detroit and Buffalo who were quite adept at making quarterbacks miserable. If Schwartz' pedigree isn't enough to turn your gears, try this on for size – the Eagles open the season against Cleveland (second in FPPG allowed to defenses in 2015) and then follow that up with a Monday nighter against Chicago (eighth in FPPG given up to defenses last year).

Danny Woodhead – RB, San Diego Chargers (ADP: RB30, Round 9)

We'll work here under the assumption that we need a "flex" option, and in that case you can't do much better than Woodhead, who would apparently have to rush for 3,000 yards while simultaneously saving Metropolis from Lex Luthor in order to get his due in fantasy leagues. Last year the 31-year-old posted nearly 1,100 total yards, caught 80 passes, scored nine times and finished the year third in PPR fantasy points. Hell, Woodhead finished inside RB1 territory in standard scoring systems. It was the second time in the past three years Woodhead was an RB1 in PPR formats, and with Melvin Gordon coming off micro-fracture surgery Woodhead is going to see plenty of action in 2016. Let's put it this way – you could draft Woodhead two rounds before this and he'd still be a value. As an RB3 he's grand larceny.

BREAKING DOWN THE 2016 FANTASY ROOKIE CLASS:

One Stud Running Back And A Handful Of Hopefuls At Wide Receiver

Mike Beacom, FootballDiehards.com

The instant Ezekiel Elliott's name was read in Chicago, fantasy football owners everywhere pushed it high up their draftboards. That's all it takes – right name, right team and BOOM, fantasy superstar status. But Elliott's case is rare. Usually the best fantasy prospects go to teams unable to support their talents. Case in point: the highest wide receiver selected, Corey Coleman, joined a Cleveland offense that tied for 26th last season in passing touchdowns. Fantasy owners greeted his arrival with a yawn.

What makes for a strong rookie season? Usually it's equal parts talent, opportunity, and system. Few rookies can place all three checkmarks next to their names, but there are several wide receivers this year that will get an opportunity to become the leading target for their respective offenses in Year 1. And a couple of quarterbacks could become starters, too, but history has shown that very few rookie quarterbacks are worth a fantasy roster spot.

Still, fantasy owners crave fresh meat. So here you go, the best of what's new in fantasy for 2016, at each of the key positions:

QUARTERBACKS

2016 Rankings: Goff, Lynch, Wentz, Kessler, Hackenberg

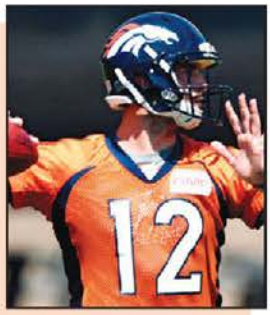
Dynasty League Rankings: Wentz, Goff, Lynch, Dak Prescott, Hackenberg, Kessler, Connor Cook

Deep Sleeper: Cardale Jones (Buffalo Bills)

Jared Goff (No. 1) – Los Angeles Rams

A franchise with a new address needs a new starting quarterback. At least the Rams felt so. The team dealt the farm to get into the top spot and draft Goff, whose three-year stay at Cal produced excellent numbers (96 touchdowns and more than 12,000 yards). Goff has the right frame (6-foot-4) and faced pro-ready competition in the Pac-12. But fantasy owners should fear whether he can handle life in the ultra-competitive NFC West, where stout defensive units in Arizona and Seattle reside.

Paxton Lynch (No. 26) – Denver Broncos



Lynch is perhaps not as talented as the two quarterbacks drafted ahead of him, but he has the easiest path to blue skies. The Broncos' desperate situation at quarterback (hello, Mark Sanchez!?) should give Lynch a fair shake in training camp. If successful, he'll inherit a lineup with a loaded receiving corps and a capable stable of running backs. Unproven Brock Osweiler looked like an All-Pro last season, suggesting Lynch could be set up for early success. Lynch's ability to avoid mistakes will help his cause; at Memphis he threw 50 touchdowns the past two seasons but just 13 interceptions.

Carson Wentz (No. 2) – Philadelphia Eagles

Like Los Angeles, the Eagles needed to pay a mighty fee to trade up to get Wentz. It's a bigger head scratcher because (a) the Eagles have cycled through several quarterbacks in recent years, and (b) Wentz was hardly tested at North Dakota State. Apparently a tape exists of Wentz' collegiate highlights, but the school has yet to make duplicates of its VHS copy. In Philadelphia, Wentz will wait behind Sam Bradford, who had a tantrum when the team drafted a quarterback. The franchise has said publicly Bradford is still the guy, but Wentz may get his chance in 2016.

Cody Kessler (No. 93) – Cleveland Browns

Is it Josh McCown or Robert Griffin III? Browns fans are wondering, and most put Kessler in the competition because neither McCown nor Griffin seem like a safe bet. Kessler was a three-year starter at USC, which should say plenty about his abilities. But even if he finds his way past McCown and Griffin he may not be of much use to fantasy owners, as the Browns' offense has plenty of issues to resolve before its quarterback will be worthy of a fantasy roster spot.

Christian Hackenberg (No. 51) – New York Jets

It's difficult to explain Hackenberg's success at Penn State, especially to fantasy owners who generally rely on numbers to tell the story. Hackenberg's numbers were not great (53.5 completion percentage last season, 31 career interceptions) but he proved to be a good game manager and capable of guiding his team to victory in the clutch (see the Maryland game). He could be the Jets' quarterback of the future, but he's not the answer at present.

RUNNING BACKS

2016 Rankings: Elliott, Henry, Booker, Prosise, Perkins, Collins, Drake, Ervin, Dixon

Dynasty League Rankings: Elliott, Henry, Drake, Dixon, Booker, Prosise, Perkins, Ervin, Collins

Deep Sleeper: DeAndre Washington (Oakland Raiders)

Ezekiel Elliott (No. 4) – Dallas Cowboys

Here he is -- the most coveted fantasy rookie in the 2016 class. It's become rare to see a running back land among the top-10 NFL Draft picks, and this case is even more unique as Dallas is just two years removed from owning the league's top rusher. The offensive line had its issues last season, but it nonetheless helped 28-year-old unwanted Darren McFadden resurrect his career. Elliott must contend with McFadden and free agent pickup Alfred Morris, but it's a formality.

Derrick Henry (No. 45) – Tennessee Titans

The bruising Alabama back went to a team emphasizing the running game under new coach Mike Mularkey. Unfortunately for Henry, the Titans also brought in DeMarco Murray and have stated bigger plans for Bishop Sankey. There are simply not enough snaps to keep all three happy, especially if the Titans cannot keep games competitive for four quarters. Henry's size will earn him short-yardage and goal line carries, but he'll need to flash his every-down potential early in camp if he is to be a relevant fantasy pick this year.

Devontae Booker (No. 136) – Denver Broncos

Next to Elliott and Henry, the only other fantasy rookie running back with summer (i.e. fantasy draft) appeal is Booker, who joins a crowded Denver backfield. The team has C.J. Anderson and Ronnie Hillman but is starting from scratch at quarterback, which could lead to a fresh look at other positions. Booker gained 2,773 yards and rushed for 21 touchdowns his last two seasons at Utah.

C.J. Prosise (No. 90) – Seattle Seahawks

If Thomas Rawls fails to replace Marshawn Lynch then Prosise would be next in line to get the opportunity. It's a coveted job – one of the best in pro football – and someone is sure to be a top-15 fantasy back. Rawls seems the safest bet, but Prosise and fellow rookie Alex Collins are nipping at his heels. Prosise was a 1,000-yard back for Notre Dame last season, despite missing significant action in the final few weeks of the season.

Paul Perkins (No. 149) – New York Giants

Not only did Perkins pile up the yards at UCLA (more than 3,300 yards from scrimmage his last two seasons), but he hit plenty of home runs (six games in 2015 with at least one run of 30+ yards). The Giants do not have a back of distinction; Rashad Jennings and Shane Vereen both seem better suited to be the complementary back rather than the featured rusher. Perkins is a long shot, but one of few middle- to late-round rookie running backs with a chance to hit the big time.

Alex Collins (No. 171) – Seattle Seahawks

Few rookie backs have the resume Collins owns (three 1,000-yard seasons in the SEC) but that won't help him much in Seattle's crowded backfield. Thomas Rawls and C.J. Prosise appear to be ahead of him on the depth chart. Still, don't count Collins out; he's a brute of a back able to fight through the mess.

Kenyan Drake (No. 73) – Miami Dolphins

He's more a utility back than a candidate to claim the starting job. At Alabama, Drake played second fiddle to Derrick Henry, but he still posted respectable totals as a rusher and receiver. Now with the Dolphins, Drake will battle Jay Ajayi for carries. Success in Year 1 seems unlikely.

Tyler Ervin (No. 119) – Houston Texans

The biggest knock on Ervin is his alma mater. He rarely lined up against top-level competition playing for San Jose State, and when he did the results were mixed. Ervin will back up Lamar Miller, who is expected to replace Arian Foster as the Texans' primary ball carrier. It could be a long wait before Ervin sees his chance in Houston.

Kenneth Dixon (No. 134) – Baltimore Ravens

The 215-pound Dixon has a nose for the end zone (72 career rushing TDs, 15 career receiving TDs at Louisiana Tech). The Ravens still have others to handle the hard-fought yards, but Dixon has more upside and should get a chance to move into the rotation during camp.

WIDE RECEIVERS

2016 Rankings: Doctson, Treadwell, Boyd, Thomas, Coleman, Shepard, Fuller, Cooper, Miller

Dynasty League Rankings: Treadwell, Coleman, Doctson, Thomas, Boyd, Fuller, Shepard, Cooper, Leonte Carroo, Miller, Malcolm Mitchell

Deep Sleeper: Aaron Burbridge (Michigan State)

Josh Doctson (No. 22) – Washington Redskins

After a brief stint at Wyoming, Doctson relocated to TCU and lit up the conference. He averaged 16.8 yards per catch as a senior and caught 14 touchdowns. The Redskins have invested in Kirk Cousins and now must invest around him. Doctson could be a legitimate No. 1 receiver, and his opportunity to advance to the front of the line in Washington makes him the most appealing fantasy receiver this season.

His athleticism could make him a fast fan favorite in the Nation's Capital.

Laquan Treadwell (No. 23) – Minnesota Vikings

The Vikings are craving a big-play receiver. Last year, unknown Stefon Diggs took on the primary role, but Treadwell has the potential to be special. He caught a touchdown in six of his final seven games for Ole Miss, including three in the Sugar Bowl win over Oklahoma State. He doesn't have blazing speed, but there's more to NFL success than just a good 40 time.

Tyler Boyd (No. 55) – Cincinnati Bengals

Boyd was a three-year star at Pittsburgh, where he caught 254 balls in just three seasons. The departures of Marvin Jones and Mohamed Sanu have left a hole in the Bengals receiving corps. Tight end Tyler Eifert is the No. 2 to A.J. Green, but beyond that camp is open. Boyd will challenge Brandon LaFell, Brandon Tate and others, and should have the edge in winning the job – if not to start the year, then soon into it.

Michael Thomas (No. 47) – New Orleans Saints

The cupboard housing the Saints' once-stocked receiving corps has been depleted in recent years. Thomas is part of the team's effort to reload. He caught 50-plus passes his last two seasons at Ohio State, and he shined brightest in the 2014 semifinal win over Alabama (seven catches). Drew Brees has helped rookies find success early, and Thomas could be next on the list.

Corey Coleman (No. 15) – Cleveland Browns

Coleman was the top receiver selected, but after landing in Cleveland that means very little. He was a standout at Baylor (although never playing with current teammate Robert Griffin III under center) and in 2015 began the year with six straight 100-yard games. The Browns' receiving corps is messy, and will remain that way until Josh Gordon's future is decided.

Sterling Shepard (No. 40) – New York Giants

Shepard caught 233 passes at Oklahoma, including 86 as a senior. As a junior he averaged 19.0 yards per catch. It's easy to see why the Giants might find a home for him in the lineup. The team has its star in Odell Beckham, but there is some uncertainty beyond that. Victor Cruz' health and Rueben Randle's departure leave the gate wide open for newcomers.

Will Fuller (No. 21) – Houston Texans

The Texans already have one of the best young wideouts (DeAndre Hopkins) and used a third-round pick on Jaelen Strong last season. Cecil Shorts is still probably the No. 2, but Strong and Fuller will challenge Shorts for that job. At Notre Dame, Fuller reached the 1,000-yard mark twice, and last season averaged better than 20 yards a catch. He's the most gifted receiver on the roster, minus Hopkins, but fantasy owners will need to be patient.

Pharoh Cooper (Pick No. 117) – Los Angeles Rams

The Rams' receiving corps is still taking shape. Kenny Britt and Brian Quick are near the front of the pack, but neither really had a prime to look back on. Tavon Austin's three-year career has been more fluff than flash, and he may never become a possession receiver. Cooper is just 21 years old but has experience. He caught 165 passes over the past two seasons at South Carolina and even ran the ball (71 career carries). He's not the most exciting prospect, but he does have a chance to shine for a Rams team desperate to find stars.

Braxton Miller (No. 85) – Houston Texans

The former two-time Big Ten offensive player of the year earns a spot on this list just for being an overachiever. When the Buckeyes decided to push Miller out from under center, he adjusted and had success as a receiver. He was not merely good, but one of the Big Ten's best. He's a smart football player with good athleticism (see his spin move against Virginia Tech). The Texans' receiving corps is getting crowded, but they will find a spot for Miller.

TIGHT ENDS

2016 Rankings: Henry, Hooper, Higbee, Vannett

Dynasty League Rankings: Henry, Vannett, Seth Devalve, Hooper, Higbee, Rico Gathers

Deep Sleeper: Jerell Adams (New York Giants)

Hunter Henry (No. 35) – San Diego Chargers

Henry couldn't have landed in a better spot. He has an opportunity to learn behind an aging Hall of Famer (Antonio Gates) and could see limited action in relief or in multi-tight end sets. Henry logged 739 yards on 51 catches last season for Arkansas, and his size will make him an attractive option if the Chargers can find him favorable matchups near the goal line.

Austin Hooper (No. 81) – Atlanta Falcons

Hooper caught 74 passes in two seasons at Stanford, including six for touchdowns last year. He's joining a Falcons offense that fed Jacob Tamme the ball 59 times last year (82 targets). Atlanta's top weapon is Julio Jones (204 targets) but the team would do well to spread the ball around a little.

Tyler Higbee (No. 110) – Los Angeles Rams

Higbee averaged 14.9 yards per catch in his final two seasons at Western Kentucky. He's been labeled "raw" by some but he fits right into a Los Angeles roster full of raw prospects. The Rams' top returning tight end (Lance Kendricks) caught just 25 balls last season.

Nick Vannett (No. 94) – Seattle Seahawks

At Ohio State, Vannett saw very little action (55 catches in four seasons) mostly because the Buckeyes didn't need him to produce. Jimmy Graham's poor health will help get Vannett some reps this preseason, but if Graham's recovery is on schedule there will be little reason for fantasy owners to consider any other tight end on the Seahawks' roster. The team still has Luke Willson and can afford to bring Vannett along slowly.

Sleep and Save

A VALUE AND AN UNDER-THE-RADAR GRAB AT EACH POSITION

Liz Loza, Yahoo! Sports

With the NFL regular season just weeks away, it's time for us fantasy fanatics to begin crafting our perfect fake football teams. Since paying full price is never fun, I went on a bargain hunting bender in preparation for this fall's festivities. Examining ADP data and combing through an array of variables – from landing spots and coaching changes to injury histories and mythical narratives – I uncovered some sweet deals. A value and sleeper at each position, the below players aren't for risk-averse managers with short memories. Mavericks on the hunt for next year's Devonta Freeman or Tyler Eifert, however, will appreciate the danger-zone appeal of my findings.

QB Value:

Eli Manning, QB, New York Giants

The subject of many a meme, Manning has long been a hard-to-trust fantasy commodity. Whether it's his penchant for turning over the ball or his uncanny resemblance to a Jim Henson creation, the two-time Super Bowl Champion has always failed to receive even a modicum of the respect that his older brother commanded.

Yet, Manning has been an FF QB1 over the last two seasons, finishing among the top-10 players at the position in 2014 and 2015. This past year, with a healthy Odell Beckham Jr., he scored a career-high 35TDs and passed for over 4,400 yards. Moreover, he closed out his eleventh season starting all sixteen regular season games. ... That's 187 consecutive starts (including post-season games) since 2005.

In an attempt to keep the ultra-durable vet upright, the G-men added to and shuffled around their offensive line. The tinkering appeared to work, as Football Outsiders ranked New York's line the sixth best in terms of pass protection in 2015.

Sacked just 27 times, Manning led New York's offense for 666 passing plays, which was the fourth most in the league. This year, that passing volume should stay the same, while Manning receives a massive weapons upgrade. With the dynamic Sterling Shepard a "lock" for the No. 2 spot, Victor Cruz expected to return on some level, and a more fully integrated Shane Vereen, Manning has an embarrassment of riches at his disposal.

According to Fantasy Football Calculator, he's currently the eleventh QB being selected in fantasy drafts, coming off the board in the ninth round. Given his recent numbers there's no reason to believe he won't return on that value. Manning remains the closest thing to a sure thing an owner can snatch up after Round 6.

QB Sleeper:

Matt Ryan, QB, Atlanta Falcons

Matt Ryan a Sleeper? Well, after falling outside of the top-14 fantasy signal-callers in 2015, he is certainly on thin ice. The reason he's plummeting to the eleventh (!!!) round of drafts is because he was so bad last year, and fans of the virtual game are annoyed. So why not take advantage of the obvious recency bias and lean into the value?

Ryan absolutely struggled to pick up Kyle Shanahan's offense last fall and winter. But he's also a cerebral talent who should be able to grasp the system's nuances with sixteen starts now under his belt. And he won't have to worry about trying to fill the void that Roddy White, who he spent eight seasons developing a rapport with, left when he fell off a cliff in Week 2.

I mean, let's get real, Ryan has the distinct privilege of lobbing the ball at Julio Jones. The rest of the corps may not offer oodles of flashiness, but they are reliable. Mohamed Sanu defined the word when he filled in for A.J. Green back in 2014, amassing 18 catches, 326 total yards, and a score for the three weeks the stud was sidelined. And let's not forget the pass-catching prowess of Devonta Freeman, who racked up the third most receiving yards among RBs in 2015, securing 73 balls via the air for 578 yards.

Plus, it's not like Atlanta's stable of options is completely devoid of upside. Second-year man Justin Hardy impressed at OTAs. In fact, when asked about the slot man's budding future, Julio himself noted the 24-year-old's growth and stated the youngster would, "make great plays [for us] this season."

Admittedly, Ryan's appeal lies wholly in his floor. He's been a fantasy starter for five of the past six years. No, he's never going to be a top-5 commodity, but it's more likely than not that he finishes in the QB10 – QB14 range, while also delivering consistent production on a week-to-week basis.

RB Value:

Jordan Howard, RB, Chicago Bears

Per the Chicago Tribune, John Fox recently intimated that he'd likely use a "hot hand" approach at running back. An RBBC enthusiast since the early 2000's, Fox's comments aren't particularly shocking, but they do bring into question the values of Jeremy Langford and Jordan Howard.

After Matt Forte's official departure from the team, many assumed that Langford would inherit the vet's touches. A wrench was thrown into this supposition, however, when the Bears selected Howard in the fifth round of the 2016 draft. A physical player with excellent vision and power, Howard appears to have everything that Langford lacks.

Yet, according to current ADP data, Langford is the seventeenth RB coming off of the board, being drafted at the top of the fourth round (4.02). Ironically he's going a few spots after Forte, and ahead of players like DeMarco Murray and C.J. Anderson. That's awfully high for a guy whose coach is already admitting he's aiming to employ a tandem.

After Forte returned from injury in Week 12, both he and Langford were in a near 50-50 timeshare through the end of the season. Over the ensuing four weeks, Forte averaged nearly 49 percent of snaps. Whereas, Langford was on the field for 46 percent of snaps (Note: I did not include Week 17 in my calculation as Forte was allowed a final bow of sorts, and given 90 percent of the offensive snaps.)

In that time, Langford wasn't particularly good. While he did flash some receiving ability in Week 10 with an 83-yard score against the Rams, he also dropped eight balls (the most of any RB in 2015) and posted a catch percentage of just 55 percent. Drafted in part due to his previous experience as a wide receiver, those numbers are far from stud status.

Furthermore, Langford's rushing production underwhelmed, as he averaged just 3.6 YPC. His after contact numbers were even worse at just 1.8 yards, placing him among the bottom-15 players at the position for that statistical category. These stats suggest that scouts who dinged the Michigan State product for his lack of physicality and toughness between the tackles were indeed correct.

It's no wonder then that the Bears went out and got a guy who weighs twenty pounds more and doesn't shy away from contact. While there's likely to be a learning curve for the rookie, and Coach Fox has a tendency to defer to experience over youth, Howard is still the back to own in Chicago. With fantasy managers dubious about the unknown, the former Hoosier presents absurd late-round value. It wouldn't surprise me to see him handle 10-12 touches per game, mixing in on early-downs and at the goal line.

Attempting to craft a next-gen version of Stephen Davis and Deshaun Foster in the Windy City, Fox is revving the run in 2016. Howard owners are going to enjoy being along for the ride.

RB Sleeper:

Melvin Gordon, RB, San Diego Chargers

Burning fantasy owners who drafted him in the late third and early fourth rounds last summer by finishing outside of the top-50 fantasy RBs, Gordon was one of last season's biggest busts – never once finding the end zone and averaging just 3.5 YPC, the former Badger was shut down two weeks before the regular season ended with a knee injury. Reports surfaced in the spring that the first-round talent underwent micro-fracture surgery earlier in the year to correct the issue. As a result, his ADP has plummeted to the sixth round, placing the 23-year-old in RB3 territory.

Sleeper lovers, I invite you to rejoice at the market's overcorrection. Despite all of the negatives coming out of 2015, there are plenty of positives to note heading into the fall. First and foremost, the Chargers' apparent lack of concern and stalwart commitment to the youngster is telling. The team did nothing to address their backfield during the NFL's free agency period. During the draft they didn't add another back but instead selected Derek Watt (yes, J.J.'s brother), who was a fullback at Wisconsin and blocked for Gordon during the RB's record-breaking run.

Speaking of blocking, the Bolts' offensive line last year displayed as much strength as a gaggle of third graders playing a game of Red Rover. Ranked 31st in run blocking by Football Outsiders, San Diego's line was decimated by injuries. As a result, the team's five starters only played together for a handful of quarters, preventing the line from properly gelling and the ground game from finding a rhythm. Despite this, Gordon still avoided an impressive 34 tackles (the ninth best at the position for that statistical category per Pro Football Focus). Assuming the line returns to even a moderate level of health and given Watt's addition, Gordon should certainly improve on his first-year numbers.

WR Value:

Torrey Smith, WR, San Francisco 49ers

Smith closed out his inaugural year at Levi's Stadium posting an underwhelming 33-663-4 stat line. That's a pretty steep drop-off from the 11 TDs he hauled in just a season before. While his skill set has never possessed much texture, his red-zone prowess can't be denied. A boom or bust deep threat, Smith has always had more appeal in best-ball formats.

However, with Anquan Boldin out the door and given the lack of seasoned talent on the 49ers depth chart, much more will be expected of Smith in the fall. Can he expand his route tree? Have we heard this before? As the forty-ninth receiver being selected in the middle-end of the eleventh round does it matter? To answer those questions. …Maybe. Yes. And nope.

Despite catching fewer than 50 balls in 2014, Smith found the end zone eleven times and finished among the top-20 fantasy players at the position. Even if he isn't able to pu pu platter it up in Kelly's offense, he's still going draw a ton of targets, and a good amount of those figure to be in the red area of the field.

Speedsters like Jeremy Maclin and DeSean Jackson have found success in Kelly's system, being deployed primarily from the outside and taking the top off of defenses. They each saw well over 100 looks during their respective campaigns with Chip. As the team's No. 1 wideout Smith has a chance to mine upwards of 120 targets.

Given a career catch percentage rate of 53.6, the 27-year-old should double the number of grabs he recorded last year and flirt with an all-time high of 70 receptions. Factoring in his impressive yards per reception percentage (20.1 in 2015, the most of any WR) he could easily churn out 1,000 yards. Throw in 8-9 TDs and the former Raven returns to being a top-20 fantasy asset. And he's only going to cost you a WR4 pick.

WR Sleeper:

Bruce Ellington, WR, San Fancisco 49ers

Does the aforementioned Smith's lack of steady production turn you off? Or are you a PPR enthusiast who likes high-volume slot guys that offer week-to-week consistency? Then let me introduce you to Bruce Ellington.

Cousin to Andre Ellington of the Cardinals, the South Carolina product is an explosive player with strong hands and mind-bending agility. His after the catch ability is tantalizing, as evidenced by the 70-yard TD he scored in the final pre-season game of 2015.

Previously used primarily on special teams, Ellington appears poised to receive a promotion. Working with the ones as the team's slot receiver during OTAs, the 49ers' new HC has admitted to be being "intrigued" by the 24-year-old's potential. Likely to handle the bulk of the underneath work in Kelly's system (plus a good dose of Chip-esque gadget plays), Ellington could (just as Eagles' slot man Jordan Matthews did in 2014) catch 65-70 balls in his third pro campaign. Currently undrafted in leagues, Ellington is an excellent off-the-radar late-round stash with sexy flexy appeal.

TE: Value:

Jordan Cameron, TE, Miami Dolphins

Remembering that Cameron put up an 80-917-7TD stat line in 2013 is only slightly less painful than recalling the lyrics to the ultra-popular single "What Does the Fox Say," which went viral that same year. Both one-hit-wonders in their own rights, Cameron's ability to produce a successful follow-up seems more likely than squeezing another popular jam out of "Fox" scribe Ylvis.

Two seasons removed from a top-5 fantasy finish, the former basketball standout isn't coming off the board until the very end of drafts, in the fourteenth round. After a series of concussions put a damper on his time in Cleveland, many expected he'd bounce back upon relocating to Miami. While the Cali native suited up for sixteen starts in 2015 (the first time in his career he was able to do so), his usage was limited and some say suspect, as the result of numerous coaching changes.

At 6'5" and 245 pounds, Cameron possesses ideal size. His measurable are additionally off the charts. In fact, the metrics site Player Profiler comps him to Julius Thomas. Interestingly, Thomas was a TD machine in 2014 while playing under Adam Gase, who is, ironically, Miami's newly installed HC.

Running a TE-friendly system, Gase has freely admitted his affection for the position and his eagerness to work with a specimen of Cameron's caliber. For his part, Cameron appears equally excited. It was recently reported that he took a $1.5 million pay cut in order to play for Gase. Understanding QB Ryan Tannehill's downfield limitations in tandem with Gase's history of elevating the position (heck, even the Bears' Zach Miller was a top-5 fantasy play over the final nine weeks of last season) Cameron's potential reward well outweighs his minimal late-round risk.

TE Sleeper:

Clive Walford, TE, Oakland Raiders

Walford scored the first TD of his pro career just after the Raiders' bye in Week 7 of last year. From that point on his usage increased, surpassing veteran TE Mychal Rivera on the depth chart. Between Weeks 7 and 17, Walford was on the field for an average of 30 snaps per game (compared to Rivera's 21), which means he was utilized for 47 percent of the Raiders' offensive action through those 11 contests.

Third in targets behind Amari Cooper and Michael Crabtree, the Miami product was looked to a total of 43 times over the final two thirds of the season. Five of his six red-zone targets came down the stretch as his rapport with QB Derek Carr developed and his improved knowledge of the playbook became more obvious. At 6'4" and 251 pounds, Walford is a looming red-zone target for the young QB. In fact, the 24-year-old matched Cooper and Crabtree's red-zone production, scoring the same number of times (2) inside the twenty-yard line despite far fewer opportunities.

Assuming defenses key in on Cooper and taking into consideration a favorable strength of schedule, Walford appears primed for a classic second-year breakout. Currently the eighteenth tight end coming off of draft boards, the talented upstart offers oodles of upside. Missing mini-camp due to an ATV related knee injury isn't ideal, but if he lights it up in training camp he could very well enter the season as the team's clear-cut starter at the position.

The 'No Draft' Team
The Lineup You Don't Want For 2016

By Mike Beacom

Minutes before the clock starts ticking you conjure up your dream team: "If I get so-and-so in round one, and so-and-so is still on the board in Round 2 then I can. …" It's the lineup you believe can take you to the fantasy title this year. If all the pieces fall perfectly into place, victories will come easy this season.

But what if your steps are all wrong? What if your dream team is instead a nightmare concoction of players primed to disappoint? High-ranked players fall short every season -- it's natural to fantasy. Many are not "busts" but rather players with unrealistic numbers to reach (or match from the year prior). The biggest secret to fantasy success is not the ability to identify sleepers, but the ability to sidestep those players destined to underperform. Master that skill and your dreams of a fantasy title will become a reality.

Here is a starting lineup made up of players you may want to sidestep in 2016. …

QB Cam Newton, Carolina Panthers

In recent years, very few Most Valuable Player (MVP) award recipients have lived up to expectations in the following season. It's merely a trend, not evidence against Newton. Still, it's difficult to view Newton as anything but overrated headed into this season. He's the top-ranked fantasy quarterback in the view of most, and he's coming off a year in which his QB Rating was a full 10 points better than any other season of his career. Is what we saw in 2015 the real Cam Newton – the player fantasy owners should expect? Probably not. For one thing, consider how inconsistent Newton was throughout his hallmark season. He had seven games last year with a passer rating below 80.0, and six games with fewer than 200 yards passing. Of course, what fantasy owners care most about are his rushing opportunities, but it's hard to believe Carolina's front office will allow its top investment to set another career high in rushing attempts, like he did in 2015 (132). No, instead expect the Panthers to find ways to extend Newton's life as a franchise quarterback. He is still a premier goal-line threat and deep-ball maestro, but it's too much to expect to catch lightning in a bottle two years in a row.

RB Jamaal Charles, Kansas City Chiefs

Charles has missed 27 games over the past five seasons, including 11 last year. He has suffered multiple severe knee injuries and, worse yet, he's on the cusp of turning 30. That's too much baggage for a projected No. 1 fantasy back, no matter what the upside is. The Chiefs remained competitive last season thanks to Charcandrick West and Spencer Ware, both of whom return to the backfield this season. Neither will "steal" Charles' starting job, but both will see carries, as will Alex Smith, who ranked fourth last year in rushing attempts (84) among quarterbacks. Plus, the emergence of several weapons in the passing attack – notably tight end Travis Kelce – could tip the scales in the passing game's favor.

RB C.J. Anderson, Denver Broncos

The dismantling of the Denver offense will have the greatest impact on its backfield. For all his flaws last season, Peyton Manning still commanded a lot of respect from opposing defenses. This opened up room for Anderson and Ronnie Hillman. Both are back this season, although Anderson is the preferred choice among fantasy owners (even though Hillman had the better stat line last season). Some fantasy analysts believe Anderson to be a fringe No. 1 back, but most have him as a mid-tier No. 2 back. Regardless, there are several reasons for concern. The Broncos added rookie Devontae Booker, who will be in the mix for the job this preseason. Because the Broncos are starting a fresh face at quarterback it's more likely they will treat the backfield as an open competition, as well. If nothing else, the backfield is crowded, suggesting Anderson will not see enough touches to warrant making him a No. 2 fantasy back. Plus, let's not forget Anderson was a no-show in the first half of both the 2014 and 2015 seasons. He has yet to pull together a full season, and the Broncos' 2016 outlook does not suggest this is the year we'll see him do that.

WR Antonio Brown, Pittsburgh Steelers

Many have pegged Pittsburgh's top weapon as the top fantasy prospect for 2016, in large part due to the lack of competition for that title. Think about it: Adrian Peterson is 31 years old, Le'Veon Bell has started just 35 games in three seasons, Todd Gurley and Ezekiel Elliott are relatively unproven, and very little separates Dez Bryant from Julio Jones from A.J. Green. Brown is the best of what we have to choose from. But he is one of the weakest consensus No. 1 fantasy prospects in recent history. In PPR leagues, he's golden (an average of 125 catches over the past three seasons), but his touchdown numbers are lacking for a top overall pick (38 in six seasons), and last year he had six games with fewer than 75 yards receiving. Not quite boom-or-bust, Brown is not exactly the new Calvin Johnson, either. Here's the thing -- why Brown makes a list like this one: He cannot live up to his expected draft position. It doesn't mean he will have a bad year, only that it's unlikely he will post numbers that will justify making him the No. 1 overall pick. Add to this Pittsburgh's desire to get Markus Wheaton and newly-added Ladarius Green more involved in the passing attack and one has to wonder whether Brown is even the best wide receiver on the board, let alone the best overall player.

WR T.Y. Hilton, Indianapolis Colts

Opponents successfully slowed down Hilton last season. In the final nine games of the year, Carolina held him to one catch, Atlanta kept him to 21 yards, and Pittsburgh, Houston and Tennessee all kept him under 50 yards. He had only two good games over the second half of the season, and that's not good enough to cut it as a No. 2 fantasy receiver in most leagues. There were some other factors at work, notably Andrew Luck's injuries. But Hilton appears to be on the decline, and the Colts seem primed to spread the ball around more, as they continue to add weapons to Luck's arsenal. Both Donte Moncrief and Phillip Dorsett are hungry for more work. Hilton may still remain Luck's preferred weapon of choice, but his fantasy stock is falling as he enters his fifth season.

TE Gary Barnidge, Cleveland Browns

See if you buy this storyline: An unnamed player is picked up early in the fifth round of the NFL Draft and bounces around before catching on as a bit player. Then, in his eighth season at age 30, he catches 79 passes for more than 1,000 yards and nine touchdowns. The narrative is hard to believe, but it belongs to Barnidge, who suddenly is a top-10 fantasy prospect. Last season Barnidge had three 100-yard games, and in four games was targeted more than 10 times. But as inspiring as this all sounds, it's a tough sell for 2016. The Browns must make strides on offense, which makes it unlikely the team will target their soon-to-be 31-year-old tight end 123 times again this year. And Barnidge's fortunes could change dramatically if Robert Griffin III wins the starting job and finds rhythm with other receivers in Cleveland's arsenal – the team drafted five wide receivers in April and could welcome back Josh Gordon, if reinstated by the league.

PK Graham Gano, Carolina Panthers

Fantasy owners love kickers from successful teams, which often make the kickers from the previous year's Super Bowl teams popular choices come draft time. The general mindset is that team wins equal team points which leads to kicking points. Gano was a factor in helping Carolina claim the conference title last season (his 146 points were second only to New England's Stephen Gostkowski) but Gano's success was shaky. He ranked 20th in field goal accuracy (83.3%) and missed three extra points. Accuracy has always been an issue for Gano, who has logged better than an 85 percent success rate just once in the past six seasons. Carolina has provided a lot of opportunities the past two seasons (71 field goal attempts) but it seems unlikely they will provide 59 extra point attempts again in 2016. Gano is a risk-reward kicker, and there are much safer bets with comparable upside.

DYNASTY LEAGUE STRATEGY
Rising And Falling Players Heading Into 2016

Jacob Feldman, DynastyLeagueFootball.com

The lack of an offseason is one of the best things about dynasty leagues. Player values are constantly changing, especially in a world filled with social media. Mix in free agency, trades, and the NFL draft, and it all can leave your head spinning just a bit. Here are some of the biggest risers and fallers Dynasty leagues since the Super Bowl.

DYNASTY STOCK UP

Golden Tate and Marvin Jones, WRs DET

The relatively surprising retirement of one of the best receivers to ever play the game has left a major hole in the Detroit offense. Someone needs to fill it! Tate has shown us what he can do without Megatron several times in the last two years, including the three-game span where he had 23 receptions and four touchdowns last December. Jones, the only notable addition to the team's wide receiver group this offseason, has also shown flashes over his career. Between the two of them, they will have a ton of opportunity to produce. One could even push for top-15 receiver status this year. I like Tate's talent a lot better, but Jones is significantly cheaper right now -- which could make him the better value.

Jeremy Langford, RB CHI

One of the worst-kept secrets in football was 2015 being Matt Forte's last season in Chicago. It was the end of an era. Forte stands in second place on the team's all-time rushing yardage list and third in total touchdowns. What is more shocking is that he's also second all-time in receptions and sixth in receiving yardage. That's a lot of lost production which someone needs to make up for. Langford is the guy who has the best chance to take over. He has the skill set and talent to be involved in all aspects of the game, much like Forte. Langford won't ever be an elite running back, and might lose goal-line carries, but he's someone you can get pretty cheap whose production could vastly exceed his price tag.

Ezekiel Elliott, RB DAL

It is tough to say a rookie's value has risen since the Super Bowl (given that he wasn't in the league last year), but I think Elliott is a special case. He's pretty much the universal No. 1 selection in all rookie drafts this year thanks to his combination of size, ability, and situation. While there are some long-term questions due to age and pending free agency for some key linemen, this is the same offense that turned DeMarco Murray into a superstar and helped Darren McFadden achieve his first 1,000-yard rushing season since 2010. Imagine what will happen when Elliott gets on the field! He's the most talented rusher in Dallas since Emmitt Smith. This is part of the reason why some already have Elliott pegged as a top-3 running back in their dynasty rankings before he's ever played a down at the professional level.

Other big climbers: David Johnson, RB ARI; Jay Ajayi, RB MIA; Ryan Matthews, RB PHI; Allen Hurns, WR JAC

DYNASTY STOCK DOWN

DeMarco Murray, RB TEN

Speaking of Murray, he's had a rather rough offseason. Just two years ago he had nearly 2,500 yards from scrimmage (if you combine the regular season and the playoffs). Unfortunately for him, the Eagles, and Chip Kelly, topping 400 carries in that amazing 2014 campaign might have essentially ended Murray's career. He had his worst year ever in 2015 and ended up being traded to the Titans for what basically amounted to half of a bologna sandwich. The fact that the Eagles couldn't get a better deal in return for Murray tells you a bit about how NFL teams view him and his contract. While he should be able to take command of the Tennessee backfield (assuming he can outplay rookie Heisman winner Derrick Henry), Murray is a shell of his former self and can't be trusted in fantasy leagues.

Martavis Bryant, WR PIT

One of the rising stars in the Steelers' offense last year, Bryant seemed poised for a huge year in 2016. He was entering his third season in the league and seemed ready to make the jump into the top-20 receiver ranks. He has size, talent, and a lot of great weapons around him. Unfortunately, he also seems to be a major knucklehead. Following in the footsteps of players like Justin Blackmon and Josh Gordon, Bryant received a one-year suspension for violating the NFL's substance abuse policy. With neither Blackmon nor Gordon reinstated back into the league after their transgressions, it is fair to wonder if Bryant will meet a similar fate.

Thomas Rawls, RB SEA

This might be surprising to a few because Rawls had some really good games last year. However, the broken ankle is a major concern for me. It is a huge deal for a running back. Mix in Seattle drafting a pair of talented rushers as well as showing interest in several free agent running backs, and there seems to be an awful lot of smoke in the Emerald City. Others have taken notice, sending Rawls' dynasty stock in the downward direction recently. There's a ton of risk involved here, so beware!

Other fallers: Josh Gordon, WR CLE; Alfred Morris, RB DAL; Matt Forte, RB NYJ; Jimmy Graham, TE SEA

These are just a fraction of the big movers this offseason. Make sure you get informed with the help of some great websites and magazines to help you dominate your league this year!

Experts Draft Recap: Strategy Insight

Jen Ryan, FootballDiehards.com

Recently, a group of some of the smartest fantasy football minds in the industry participated in a PPR draft for a weekly roster management league. I reached out to the experts who participated in the draft to gain insight into some of their picks and strategy. The amount of knowledge attainable by following an experts draft is further enhanced by learning the "why" behind their draft strategy. Here are some observations on their draft strategies and some insight on their picks.

Nick Bakay

Nick took a balanced approach to this draft in going WR, RB, TE, RB and WR with his first five picks. That balance allowed Nick to draft for value rather than need. He also paired his stud running back LeSean McCoy with quarterback Tyrod Taylor. Offensive stacks can be beneficial, especially in PPR scoring with a running back who is a dual threat.

Nick has McCoy ranked as his RB8, ahead of Doug Martin (RB9) and Mark Ingram (RB12). Nick told me "McCoy is going to be the Bills' offense, and he has a history of elite seasons. Meanwhile, Doug Martin has been wildly inconsistent, as has Ingram. Until either player strings together two stellar years in a row, the trust factor isn't there." Historical finishes should be considered when you are drafting. FootballDiehards.com's "Player Career Charts" tool contains data of every fantasy football player's finishing rank since 2009. Over the past three seasons, McCoy has had two RB1 finishes as opposed to Martin and Ingram who have had just one each.

Jim Sannes

With the second pick in the draft Jim put together a team of receivers with high floors and running backs with high ceilings. Three of his first four picks went to the receiver position -- he selected Jamaal Charles in the second round as the RB8. A healthy Charles is a legitimate threat to finish No. 1 at his position in 2016. By being so secure in the receiver position and locking down a top running back early on, Jim was able to take shots in the later rounds on some high-ceiling running backs. Melvin Gordon (RB34) is all but guaranteed to hit positive regression from his zero touchdowns last season and PPR machine Darren Sproles fell all the way to RB57.

The experts in this draft have Langford all over the place in their rankings, from RB18 all the way up to RB31. Jim is one of the experts who ranked Langford as the RB18. If you are high on a guy it is important to get him. Sometimes that means jumping a few spots or a round to do so, and that is fine. Sometimes this player falls to you, as in Jim's case. He was able to get his RB18 as the RB26 in this draft. These boom-or-bust types of players are the mid-round selections that can win you your league.

Alex Miglio

Alex stacked the top contributors of the Atlanta offense with his first two picks by selecting Julio Jones and Devonta Freeman. Alex joked about stacking the Atlanta offense but, as he put it, he "just couldn't resist taking such a good value at the back end of the second round". There are certain offenses in the league that tend to be fantasy football juggernauts and the Falcons are one of them.

Jones and Freeman had exactly 300 targets between them last season, with Jones being the only player in the league with more than 200 targets. Targets are what you should be chasing in PPR drafts. At FootballDiehards.com we have a tool that accumulates target stats as well as snap counts and percentages. Target/snap analysis is the foundation for fantasy football production.

Tim Heaney

The middle rounds are where fantasy drafts are won, and Tim spends back-to-back picks in those rounds on rookie running backs. When you are throwing darts at players it can pay off to be bold and take a chance on an unproven back. As Tim noted, "Look at last year's success stories: Todd Gurley, Thomas Rawls, Karlos Williams, David Johnson, and Javorius Allen. So as long as they're cheap, as my two were, there's plenty of room for profit."

Each player he named besides Gurley was a waiver wire back. If your team is competitive you will not have a chance to pick up the top waiver player in a given week. Tim's strategy of grabbing those backs now as opposed to fighting for them with waiver claims later is the type of move that wins you money.

Andy Behrens

Andy's second pick in the draft, Demaryius Thomas (WR13) could be the most valuable pick on his team. His tactic of drafting the player people are down on will have a huge benefit if Thomas finishes as a top-5 receiver, which he did from 2012-2014 before falling off a bit last season. People remember the last thing you did, and in fantasy football that can lead to serious value -- which is why you should capitalize on recency bias. Thomas' 2015 season was a fluke in terms of production, much like Cam Newton's 2014 season was. When you are drafting, take advantage of last year's down season and the draft value that comes with it.

Justin Lonero

Justin drafted Aaron Rodgers as the QB2 in the sixth round. Rodgers' fantasy stock took a hit in 2015 with Jordy Nelson missing the entire season and Randall Cobb battling a shoulder injury for the majority of the year. With both receivers healthy, Rodgers is a lock to return to elite-fantasy status.

Justin also drafted Derek Carr, and when I asked him why he would take a second quarterback as a Rodgers owner, he told me "My team was already built. It was time for a backup QB and not a scrub." There are various schools of thought when it comes to quarterbacks in fantasy football. If you are not interested in the risk associated with streaming quarterbacks (which can be like playing daily fantasy with one player on your redraft roster) it is wise to get that second "back end QB1," as Justin put it. Green Bay is up first on the schedule for bye weeks with theirs coming in Week 4. Having a backup quarterback on an explosive offense when your QB1 has an early bye saves you the trouble of filling that important position early in the season.

John Paulsen

John's Chris Hogan pick is worth discussing considering he a top sleeper this season. When I spoke to John about the pick, he more than sold me him: "His skill set isn't much different from that of Julian Edelman or Danny Amendola. He could potentially have a 2014 Brandon LaFell-type season. He is reportedly 'catching everything' and 'constantly getting open' at off-season activities."

Hogan was the WR59 in this draft. Julian Edelman and Danny Amendola are both nursing injuries. John also gave me some insight into something he does in paying attention to offseason activities. Nothing may be more beneficial than being tuned into what the beat reporters are saying about players' performances during off-season work. This is where sleepers are found, and when you identify a sleeper like Hogan you should be targeting them in your drafts -- as John did.

Alex Gelhar

Alex's team brings me to the topic of homer picks in fantasy football. When I brought this up with Alex he told me "Yes, it's great having players on my fantasy teams who I actively root for on Sundays, but the Packers' offense is one of the most potent and highest scoring units in the NFL. So basically, it's a win-win for me in that regard." Jordy Nelson and Eddie Lacy are poised for huge bounce-back seasons, and Alex grabbed James Starks, too. The label of being a homer is immaterial here because these players are studs at their positions. If you are going to be watching football all day and stressing out about your fantasy team, why not enjoy those moments when your fantasy players from your favorite team put up huge games?

Matt Kelley

There is no greater representation of Shawn Siegele's "zero RB theory" in this draft than Matt's team, and he pushed the envelope in drafting receivers with his first six picks. Jonathan Stewart took an inexplicable tumble and fell into Matt's lap in the seventh round as the RB29. Stewart has been an RB2 for consecutive seasons, the Panthers did next to nothing to upgrade their running game, yet Matt was still able to draft him in RB3 territory. This, in my humble opinion, was the steal of the draft. He followed up his Stewart pick with Charles Sims (who is a close second as the steal of the draft) and T.J. Yeldon.

As evidenced by the 2015 season, the running back position is a volatile one. Matt's approach nearly guarantees he will have the quality and depth to flex a wide receiver each week as opposed to a running back. If you commit to the zero RB theory in PPR drafts you are giving yourself the depth needed to flex receivers.

Bob Harris

There is a lot to like about Bob's team, but two things really stick out in terms of draft strategy. He invested wisely in the quarterback position, and he took a flier on Josh Gordon. In selecting Drew Brees as the QB6 and Eli Manning as the QB10 with back-to-back picks, Bob drafted trade bait. By his own admission, it gives him "the option to play the matchups or in leagues that allow trading, it obviously gives me ample ammo if that need arises." Drafting potential trade bait is a great way to get an early upper hand on your competition. When a competitor's stud quarterback inevitably succumbs to injury, you will be ready to offer a potentially lopsided and beneficial trade to a desperate owner.

In a league that allows waivers, as this league does, Bob now has Gordon at his disposal. If it is announced that Gordon will not play he can be dropped with no penalty outside of losing the WR68. However, if Gordon plays for "a team with a long history of successfully adding talented-but-troubled players and getting the most out of them" he could strike gold. He is talking to you, Bill Belichick. Come draft day, do not be afraid to draft Josh Gordon with a late pick.

John Laub

John had the distinction of drafting that rookie running back that everyone in the fantasy football community is talking about. Ezekiel Elliott fell to John at 1.11, and he told me he was confident he would fall there based on his ADP. John went into this draft with a concise strategy with the 11th overall pick: "Draft either Todd Gurley or Elliot followed by the highest rated receiver remaining on my board."

NFL general managers utilize draft boards each year during the NFL draft. Fantasy general managers should do the same. The tricky part is sticking to your draft board. John executed this strategy flawlessly with his first-round pick.

Mike Beacom

I mentioned a few bold strategies deployed in this draft, but Mike took the bravest approach. He drafted Kelvin Benjamin, Kevin White, Thomas Rawls, Jimmy Graham, and Rob Gronkowski, all players with a range of injury histories. I agree with his reasoning behind these picks: "You must consider all factors, and injury history is certainly a factor. But I refuse to succumb to fear."

If you draft passively, this game is not for you. When you play with a lack of fear you draft aggressively and with confidence. Mike drafted players his competitors were likely afraid to, and his fearless approach is a champion's approach.

By picking a small piece of each of these experts' brains you are able to get inside the minds of some of the best drafters in the industry. To be the best one must learn from the best, and the insight they provided is invaluable.

ALL-IN OR FOLD

Jake Ciely,
RotoExperts.com

All-In Quarterback – Eli Manning, NYG (QB9)

Let everyone else hate him because of "Eli face" and the perception of numerous interceptions. Manning does have two high-interception seasons, but they were before Odell Beckham came to town. Or, more importantly, before Ben McAdoo arrived. Manning's stats are impressive over the last two seasons with 4,410 and 4,436 yards, 30/35 touchdowns and 283.5/301.5 fantasy points. … 14 interceptions each season for those wondering.

Even if Victor Cruz can't return to glory (or even be a contributing member of the offense), the Giants added Sterling Shepard during the draft. Shepard will help make up for Rueben Randle's mental lapses now that Randle is in Philly. Larry Donnell is returning as well giving the Giants several options at tight end, and UDFA Roger Lewis is extremely talented and could push for playing time as a rookie. McAdoo's offense runs as many three-receiver sets as any team, so Manning will be passing plenty again in 2016. A third straight season of 4,400 yards and 30-plus touchdowns is nearly a lock, making Manning a QB1 despite no one wanting to draft him as such.

Fold Quarterback – Matt Ryan, ATL (QB20)

Surprising to many fantasy owners, Ryan only has one season with over 30 touchdowns. That happens to also be the only year he topped 300 fantasy points. Since that 2012 season, Ryan has averaged 4,600 yards but only 25 touchdowns and had just 21 last year. It's hard to expect that number to improve much with Roddy White gone. Mohamed Sanu replaces White via free agency but is not the same red-zone presence. Sanu's career high in touchdowns is five. That leaves scoring in the passing game to Julio Jones, Devonta Freeman, Tevin Coleman, Justin Hardy and Jacob Tamme. It's hard to see a high volume of touchdown catches coming anywhere else than from Jones, who has only topped eight once in his career despite being one of the best receivers in the game. Lastly, Ryan had just one game with more than two touchdown passes last year, further proving that he's not an ideal fantasy quarterback.

All-In Running Back – Carlos Hyde, SF (RB15)

It's all about health with Hyde. We've seen what he's capable of with his Week 1 performance against the Vikings (26 carries, 168 yards, two TDs) last season. He also dominated the Giants in Week 5 with 93 yards and a touchdown on 21 carries. Those were the only two games where Hyde was 100 percent healthy. Hyde has the power and burst to succeed as a lead back, and the 49ers will turn to him plenty with Torrey Smith as the lead receiving option ahead of an abundance of questions. In fact, the 49ers plan to work Hyde into the passing game more this season. If we were guaranteed a full 16 games from Hyde, I'd rank him inside the top 10. Even so, you'll be happy to own Hyde this season.

Fold Running Back – Derrick Henry, TEN (RB44)

Henry needs a few steps to get his momentum going, but once he does, he's a chore to take down. Seeing a running back this big with that speed is jaw-dropping. However, the Titans now employ DeMarco Murray, and he fits the Titans' offense better than he did the Eagles'. Murray is a top-20 running back with an upside chance to attain RB1 status again, especially with an improved Titans offensive line. Henry will be the short-yard and goal-line option for the Titans, but that means he will be touchdown reliant. With numerous options at receiver, Delanie Walker at tight end and a quarterback that's a good rusher, Henry will have a lot of competition in the red zone, and is no more than a roll of the dice each week until Murray is gone or injured.

All-In Wide Receiver – DeVante Parker, MIA (WR26)

It's Parker's time to shine in South Beach. Parker was one of the most talented receivers in last year's draft, and once he got the opportunity in Week 12, we saw the sort of upside he has. From Weeks 12-17, Parker had 22 receptions, 445 yards and three touchdowns. That works out to a 59/1,187/8 line over a full season. I'd actually expect more receptions if Parker reaches that yardage total, but either way, a 60-plus reception/1,000-plus yards seasons is doable. That puts Parker in the top 25 if he scores around seven TDs, and he should be the Dolphins' main red-zone threat this year.

Fold Wide Receiver – Nelson Agholor, PHI (WR57)

The concern with Agholor coming out of college is that he already peaked ability wise. That concern was evident last year, as he struggled to take the next step at the NFL level as a rookie. Rueben Randle struggles with consistency and drops, but he's not going to take a backseat to Agholor without a fight. In addition, Jordan Matthews is the top receiving option for the Eagles, which will trot out Sam Bradford or Carson Wentz at quarterback. ... Heck, maybe both. This isn't even a Chip Kelly offense anymore, and yet Agholor is seeing an off-season boost in ADP based on little more than hope at this point.

All-In Tight End – Vance McDonald, SF (TE19)

McDonald was the 14th-highest scoring tight end after the 49ers' Week 10 bye last year. He averaged 5.0 targets, 3.5 catches, 43.7 yards and had three TDs in that span. Those aren't league-winning numbers, but everyone is ignoring McDonald and there is potential for him to provide top-15 value. In addition, as mentioned earlier, the passing game pecking order in San Francisco goes: Torrey Smith. ... Uh. ... Hmmm. ... DeAndre Smelter is a great sleeper, but he's a big question mark, as are the rest of the 49ers' receivers. McDonald could be the second-best option on the team, maybe fourth at worst. No matter how you look at it, there is a high opportunity for targets and production from McDonald in Chip Kelly's fast-paced scheme.

Fold Tight End – Kyle Rudolph, MIN (TE25)

If one more person says, "This is the year for Rudolph," I might set fire to every red-nosed lawn ornament this Christmas! Rudolph's best season was in 2012 when he scored nine touchdowns and tallied 103 fantasy points. However, his receiving numbers in that campaign were nearly identical to last year (53/493 and 49/495). News flash: Teddy Bridgewater isn't going to throw 25 touchdowns. Heck, he'll be lucky to reach 20. It's time to give up on Rudolph ever breaking out for fantasy purposes. Sometimes you just gotta lay the cards down and live to see another hand.

EXPERTS POLL 2016

Because if Two Heads are Better than One, Then 12 Heads Should be Friggin' Awesome!

"Ipsa scientia potestas est"

For those of you who are a bit rusty on your Latin (shame on you), that phrase translates as "knowledge itself is power." It's generally attributed to Sir Francis Bacon, the 17th century English philosopher.

No, he did not invent bacon. If he had everyone would know who he was, wouldn't they?

That small failing aside, Bacon was a pretty smart cat. Because he knew that being a smart cat was how a bloke gets ahead. That acquiring knowledge gives power. And it's in the use and application of that knowledge that we exercise power.

And when it comes to the 2016 fantasy football season, you just peeled yourself off a big ol' slab of Bacon Power.

Mmmmmm. … Bacon.

Within the pages of this magazine you'll find a one-stop shop for all the information you need to make sausage of your competition in 2015. This magazine contains the opinions and rankings of many of the fantasy industry's leading experts. For them, fantasy football is much more than a hobby. It's a way of life. They're the writers who make a living covering the game and the high-stakes players whose livelihood depends on being successful at it.

So kick back, grab a cup of java, and get your learn on. When draft day rolls around, you'll be better off for doing so.

And you don't have to thank us. Although if you must, breakfast would be nice.

The DraftBook Experts' "Perfect" Draft

Every year, a group a brave fantasy football experts climb high into the clouds surrounding Nanga Parbat in search of the wisest of all fantasy sages – the all-knowing Baba Drafta.

They do so because Baba Drafta has the ability to predict and forecast that rarest of phenomena. The perfect fantasy football draft.

Granted, such a draft would be nigh impossible to actually pull off (every fantasy owner has a Lex Luthor whose life's ambition seems to be sniping picks in fantasy drafts. You know who you are), but using the DraftBook rankings and scoring, the Average Draft Position data at Fantasy Pros and a lineup featuring three starting wide receivers and a "flex" spot, here's a look at how a fantasy draft might play out in 2016 if everything fell the right way.

Of course, if the stars align in such a manner I'm pretty sure Donald Trump morphs into Donaldo the Hut and uses his army of sentient toupees to take over the universe, but hey – no plan's perfect.

These picks were selected using a randomly determined draft spot of 11th overall, which is a favorable slot in 2016. Lot of value at the back end of the turn again this year.

Round 1 (11): AJ Green – WR, Cincinnati Bengals: The MO among the majority of fantasy drafters this year is that wide receiver is the safe and steady route. If you want to talk safe and steady you can't do a whole lot better than Green, who's a lock to be among the league's most targeted WR.

Round 2 (14): Jordy Nelson – WR, Green Bay Packers: Two years ago, a healthy Nelson was third among fantasy WR in leagues that award a point for receptions. Without him last year, the Green Bay passing game fell apart. Look for a rebound from both player and team in 2016.

Round 3 (35): Carlos Hyde – RB, San Francisco 49ers: Chip Kelly loves to run the ball, and Hyde told SiriusXM Radio he's all-in with the new offense. "I definitely feel like everybody has bought into the system," he said. Big-time upside here.

Round 4 (38): Greg Olsen – TE, Carolina Panthers: No, Olsen likely won't finish as the No. 1 TE. And the veteran may not have the ceiling of a Jordan Reed. But his floor after back-to-back 1,000-yard season makes him a very appealing fantasy option.

Round 5 (59): Larry Fitzgerald – WR, Arizona Cardinals: Landing Fitzgerald in Round 6 as a fantasy WR3 is like finding $100 on the street. Was a top-10 fantasy wideout in 2015 after reeling in a career-best 109 catches for over 1,200 yards.

Round 6 (62): Jay Ajayi – RB, Miami Dolphins: Looking for upside in your RB2? NFL.com's Adam Rank said predicted a top-10 finish for Ajayi in 2016, "He's fragile and I wouldn't want to build a dynasty squad around him," Rank said. "But for this year? In Adam Gase's offense as the lead back? I'm in."

Round 7 (83): Frank Gore – RB, Indianapolis Colts: Yes, Gore is antithesis of the other backs on this squad, which is a two-dollar way of saying he's old. He's also an unquestioned lead back who quietly finished in the top 20 among PPR RB even in a "down" 2015.

Round 8 (86): Ameer Abdullah – RB, Detroit Lions: Another younger upside play in the backfield. Abdullah showed flashes as a rookie and will reportedly be afforded every opportunity to be the Lions' featured back in 2016.

Round 9 (107): Philip Rivers – QB, San Diego Chargers: Want an example of why waiting under center is advisable in fantasy drafts? How about being able to get a proven fantasy option primed for a rebound season who led the NFL in passing attempts last year in Round 9. That work?

Round 10 (119): Tavon Austin – WR, Los Angeles Rams: OK, so Austin isn't going to double his 52 catches from last year as head coach Jeff Fisher suggested. But he doesn't have to provide outstanding value for fantasy owners in Round 10.

SLEEPERS

Granted, it isn't entirely reasonable to expect Kirk Cousins of the Washington Redskins to produce at the same clip that saw him post top-5 fantasy production over the second half of the 2015 campaign. The thing is, with an ADP outside the top 20 at his position, he doesn't have to – the weapons are there for Cousins to at least serve as a strong fantasy backup who can be had for a song on draft day.

New York Giants offensive coordinator Mike Sullivan told ESPN running back Rashad Jennings impressed the new staff at OTAs. "Rashad has picked up right where he left off," Sullivan said. "He's improved as far as his reads, he's improved his pass protection, and he's even improved in his receiving ability." Jennings isn't an especially impressive lead back. The argument can be made that he's the least imposing starting tailback in the league. But Jennings is a starting running back, and any time you can acquire such a player in RB4 territory (RB38) that player is worth keeping in mind on draft day.

San Diego Chargers quarterback Philip Rivers likes what he's seen so far from wide receiver Travis Benjamin. "I already knew he was fast, but just getting around him, it is game-changing fast," Rivers said about Benjamin. "Not that we're just going to heave him a bunch of deep balls. But the threat that he can run by you, it makes every now and then an easy 10- or 12-yard completion." Rivers has been known to make the most of vertical threats in San Diego – and yet Benjamin is being drafted well below where he finished the 2015 season in Cleveland.

Kyle Rudolph of the Minnesota Vikings wasn't shy when asked by the Twin Cities Pioneer-Press who the NFL's best tight end is. "I want to have the best season that I've had as a Viking," Rudolph said. "It's no secret we need to become more balanced, and I think I play a part in that." Rudolph may be sniffing glue to rank himself among the best position, but the same can't be said for fantasy owners willing to roll the dice on Rudolph in 2016. Not with a non-existent ADP of TE25.

BUSTS

Here's a partial list of the fantasy quarterbacks being selected after Blake Bortles of the Jacksonville Jaguars in 2016. Tony Romo (Dallas Cowboys), Eli Manning (Giants), Philip Rivers (Chargers), Matthew Stafford (Detroit Lions), Matt Ryan (Atlanta Falcons). Yes, Bortles had a great year in 2015 with 35 touchdown passes. But that's also a statistic that positively screams regression in the upcoming season. This isn't to say that he'll drop all the way back to the 11 scoring strikes he had as a rookie. A drop-off of 11 touchdowns, however, is very much in play – and that would leave more than a few fantasy owners holding the bag.

It may be piling on, but what the hell. Just as chasing Bortles' 35 touchdowns from 2015 is a fool's errand, so is expecting another RB1 finish from Devonta Freeman of the Atlanta Falcons. So says Michael Beller of Sports Illustrated. "The history of running backs who emerge from seemingly nowhere to shine one season, only to crush the dreams of their fantasy owners the next, is rich and storied," Beller said. "Need I remind you of the 2015 campaigns of Jeremy Hill and C.J. Anderson? More importantly, however, Freeman's production waned significantly as the season progressed. He ran for at least 100 yards in four of his first five starts. Over his final eight games of the season, he never topped 88 rushing yards, came up shy of 60 yards five times (he got injured in one game, to be fair), and averaged 3.31 yards per carry."

Speaking of piling on – here's a handy tip for fantasy owners. Huge spikes in touchdown numbers at the wide receiver spot are much more often than not one-year anomalies. Allen Robinson of the Jacksonville Jaguars is a talented young pass-catcher. But folks spending an early second-round pick on the third-year pro are setting themselves up for a letdown.

After leading all tight ends with 13 touchdown catches last year, Tyler Eifert of the Cincinnati Bengals appeared set to join the elite fantasy options at the position. And he's being drafted like an elite option, with a TE4 ADP that places him in the fifth round of 12-team drafts. Now, however, surgery to repair an ankle injury suffered in the Pro Bowl will not only wipe out most of camp and preseason for Eifert, but it leaves his Week 1 availability very much in doubt. Nothing says "successful fantasy draft" like starting out the summer with a team that's already banged up.

BOB HARRIS

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust	Devonta Freeman
Top Fantasy Rookie	Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year	Kelvin Benjamin
Long-Shot Player	Jordan Howard
Stay-Away Player	Thomas Rawls

First-Round Bust: Freeman heads into the 2016 season with huge expectations after racking up more than 1,600 yards from scrimmage and scoring 14 touchdowns last season. And huge expectations are always a concern for me. That's especially true in this case, where said huge totals were a product of injuries to Tevin Coleman and the resulting touches Freeman enjoyed – just over 300 touches in this case. While there's no questioning Freeman's status as the offense's lead back, Coleman is going to get his turns this season if healthy. Remember, in the two games he started and finished as a rookie, Coleman tallied 38 carries for 190 yards at an average of five yards per carry. Assuming that's the case, Freeman's first-round price tag is more than I'm willing to pay.

Gutsy Picks: Indianapolis Colts quarterback Andrew Luck had easily the worst season of his NFL career last year, and Luck admitted to ESPN injuries weren't solely to blame. "Injuries aside, I was not playing very good football – before they happened," Luck said. "I've got to be better. Toward my last couple games, I felt like I was playing much better, trending in the right direction." Most pundits expect a rebound season in 2016, but not Harris – no one on our panel ranked him lower.

However, while Harris believes Andrew's out of Luck he's a bit more optimistic about the return of Carolina Panthers wide receiver Kelvin Benjamin – ranking him in high-end fantasy WR2 territory at No. 16. Quarterback Cam Newton told the team's website he looks for a big year from his top wideout. "Benji is coming back with a vengeance" Newton said. "And I mean it." Well, there you go. Since he means it, it MUST be true.

ANDY BEHRENS

Yahoo! Sports

Andy Behrens has been a Yahoo Sports fantasy analyst since 2007, and he's also written for ESPN.com, NBA.com and Lindy's Sports. He has won the Fantasy Pros rankings accuracy competitions for both the NFL and MLB. He's also the author of three novels for young readers. Andy lives and works in Chicago, where is he tormented by the Bears.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust. . . . . .Dez Bryant
Top Fantasy Rookie . . . . . Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year . . . . . .Eddie Lacy
Long-Shot Player . . . . . DeAndre Washington
Stay-Away Player . . . . . .Thomas Rawls

Stay-Away Player: Without question, Rawls' emergence was one of the great, unexpected fantasy stories of 2015. He was tremendous over a protracted period of weeks, a gift from the waiver wire. But he's also coming off a serious ankle procedure that erased his offseason. Seattle drafted three running backs this year, hardly a vote of confidence in Rawls or his recovery.

Gutsy Picks: Up year. Down year. Down year. Up year. That's been the career progression for Tampa Bay Buccaneers tailback Doug Martin, who rebounded from a pair of injury-marred seasons to finish second in the NFL in rushing in 2015. Those two disappointing campaigns have combined to make more than a few fantasy pundits a bit skittish about Martin's RB1 prospects in 2016. Not so for Behrens, who ranked "The Muscle Hamster" inside his top 5 at the position.

It wasn't just Martin whom Behrens is bullish on from the Bucs. Wide receiver Mike Evans had the dropsies for much of 2015, but Bleacher Report's Sean Tomlinson sees a rebound in store this year. "Pure talent and draft pedigree tell us Evans has it in him to reach another tier at a young age," Tomlinson said. "There's also plenty of statistical evidence showing us that we should focus on the larger body of his work both in college and the NFL, instead of a few drop-filled games." In ranking Evans sixth, Behrens apparently agrees.

ALEX GELHAR

NFL.com

Alex joined NFL Media in 2012, but didn't switch to fantasy full-time until 2014. Since then, he's focused on rebuilding the content plan and staff at NFL Fantasy in an attempt to make NFL.com a true destination for both casual and hard-core fantasy fans. While the job is far from over, he's excited with the progress made so far and is looking forward to what the future brings, both at NFL.com and in the fantasy industry in general. He's loved becoming a bigger part of a fantastic fantasy community filled with talented writers, and he's excited to take part in this draft.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust. . . . . .Devonta Freeman
Top Fantasy Rookie . . . . . Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year . . . . . .Jordy Nelson
Long-Shot Player . . . . . .Kenneth Dixon
Stay-Away Player . . . . . .Jeremy Langford

First-Round Bust: I still like Freeman a quite a bit this year, but a lot of his production was predicated on volume in 2015. Tevin Coleman still lurks as a potential vulture as well (one handpicked by the current coaching regime), and if Freeman regresses from his TD production, he could disappoint at a first-round price. He's not a full-on bust in my book, but I'd feel much more comfortable taking him in Round 2 if possible.

Gutsy Picks: While we're on the subject of the defending NFC Champions, Liz Loza of Yahoo Sports recently talked up tailback Jonathan Stewart – sort of. It is likely that Stewart will break down at some point next season," Loza said, "and force fake footballers to comb the waiver wire for a replacement. But until then, owners are pretty much guaranteed 10 FPTS per week, especially when factoring in a favorable strength of schedule. Considering he's currently pricing out as a low-end RB2/high-end RB3, that's solid production." Gelhar agrees, one of a trio of pundits who slotted Stewart inside the top 20.

There may not be a tight end in the NFL generating more fantasy hype this summer than Coby Fleener of the New Orleans Saints. As ESPN's Tristan Cockroft said, "Drew Brees' Saints routinely targeted the tight end 25-30 percent of the time in all situations and 35-40 percent in the red zone from 2013-15. There's an excellent chance that Fleener will enjoy one of the largest touchdown increases of any player in 2016." Gelhar isn't drinking the Kool-Aid, however – he ranked Fleener outside TE1 territory in 12-team leagues.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust	Ezekiel Elliott
Top Fantasy Rookie	Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year	Jamaal Charles
Long-Shot Player	Josh Gordon
Stay-Away Player	Tony Romo

First-Round Bust and Fantasy Rookie: How can Elliott be a first-round bust and the fantasy rookie of the year? Simple – he's going to score well, but not nearly well enough to merit a first-round pick. With Darren McFadden reportedly starting early and Alfred Morris signed this offseason, Elliott may actually struggle to get meaningful touches early this season. But he should play enough behind the best offensive line in the league to have some big games down the line.

Gutsy Picks: It seems like tight end Ladarius Green has been "primed for a breakout season" for years now, and with Green moving to Pittsburgh in the offseason ESPN's Jeremy Fowler rang the bell yet again. "Green will become a breakout star in this offense," Fowler wrote of Green. "He was underused in San Diego, and Ben Roethlisberger will take advantage of Green's unique skill set." Miglio likes the sound of that, one of two pundits who slotted Green inside the top 5.

Washington Redskins wide receiver DeSean Jackson will turn 30 in December. That, coupled with an injury-marred 2015 season that was easily the worst of his NFL career, have led many to start throwing dirt on Jackson as a fantasy-relevant pass-catcher. Miglio isn't grabbing a shovel just yet though. He slipped Jackson just inside his top 25 – a full 12 spots higher than Jackson's aggregate ranking by the panel.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust	Todd Gurley
Top Fantasy Rookie	Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year	Le'Veon Bell
Long-Shot Player	Jerick McKinnon
Stay-Away Player	Blake Bortles

Long-Shot Player: McKinnon carved out a role for himself toward the end of 2015 as a receiving threat, giving him a base value in point-per-reception leagues entering 2016. This will be Adrian Peterson's age-31 season, and McKinnon would be first in line for increased usage if the Vikings were to scale Peterson back at all. This combination of stand-alone value and the potential for an even greater role gives McKinnon upside that most of his peers in the late rounds of drafts can't rival. It will require patience, but the payoff of snagging McKinnon could be immense.

Gutsy Picks: Marc Sessler of NFL.com believes Indianapolis Colts running back Frank Gore has fallen through the proverbial cracks in 2016. "Gore is looking to become the first 33-year-old back to run for 1,000 yards since John Riggins did the deed at age 35 back in 1984," he said. "Gore has his moments last season, but his yards per rush tumbled to 3.7, the lowest of his entire career. If he struggles, who picks up the slack?" Sannes agrees – he's our only expert who ranked him inside the top 20.

Sannes also assigned the highest ranking (WR16) of any pundit to Green Bay Packers wideout Randall Cobb, who Wes Anderson of Today's Pigskin sees as a great value pick in 2016. "He provides an opportunity for fantasy players to get a great return on investment," Anderson said. "Being able to select Cobb at the back end of the third round in traditional fantasy drafts would be a steal if he comes close to his 2014 production this season."

Follow @Tim_Heaney and roll your eyes at his pun-laced tweets. Drink craft beer with him at … well, tweet him first to meet up. Don't stalk him or anything. That's creepy.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust	Adrian Peterson
Top Fantasy Rookie	Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year	Andrew Luck
Long-Shot Player	Keith Marshall
Stay-Away Player	Doug Martin

Stay-Away Player: Martin as a top-20 overall pick? Good luck. Not knocking what he did last year: 1,402 yards, 4.9 yards per carry, and seven total scores. But Charles Sims has many weeks when he'll steal fantasy production. More importantly, I'm not buying high after a big year. I'm expecting the passing game to take a big step after a solid first year from Jameis Winston, which could put pressure on Martin to sustain that high yardage average on fewer touches. Just too much downside for me. He's more a mid- to high RB2 than a true fantasy franchise back.

Gutsy Picks: Oakland Raiders wideout Amari Cooper had a phenomenal rookie season, but he told SBNation that he expects even bigger and better things in Year 2. "It's been a process, definitely. It doesn't happen overnight. It's communicating because you can't run every route in one day. It's just communicating and getting to know (Derek Carr) and how he wants to throw the ball and things like that." Heaney's buying in a big way – he slotted Cooper sixth, easily the highest among our panelists.

Heaney doesn't discriminate, however. Young, old, he likes them all just fine. Despite a somewhat disappointing season in 2015 (that paved the way for his departure from Chicago) and the increasing numbers on his birthday cake, Heaney isn't throwing in the towel on New York Jets tailback Matt Forte just yet. Heaney ranked Forte well inside fantasy RB1 territory at No. 7.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust	Antonio Brown
Top Fantasy Rookie	Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year	Tony Romo
Long-Shot Player	Terrance Williams
Stay-Away Player	C.J. Anderson

Stay-Away Player: The Broncos must rebuild their passing attack due to the retirement of Peyton Manning and free agent loss of Brock Osweiler. This will be no small task, and fantasy owners are well aware of what Mark Sanchez brings to the table (or what he doesn't bring). This will affect Anderson (and Ronnie Hillman) who thrived thanks to the respect defenses paid to Manning and Denver's outstanding receiving corps. Opponents can now play more aggressively and closer to the line of scrimmage. And the arrival of rookie Devontae Bookman is not good news, either. Anderson is a fringe No. 1 fantasy back headed for bustville.

Gutsy Picks: In the opinion of Adam Ronis of RotoExperts, Tom Brady's four game suspension and falling fantasy ADP are a blessing in disguise. "He can still be a QB1 for the 12 games he plays, and the addition of Martellus Bennett, Chris Hogan and the return of a healthy Dion Lewis will help boost the offense. Brady went in the eighth round of the FSTA Fantasy Football draft, which consists of 14 teams." Based on his ranking of the Patriots' signal-caller at QB4, it would appear Beacom concurs.

Seattle Seahawks running back Thomas Rawls was a revelation for both his NFL team and fantasy owners as a rookie in 2015. But coming off a badly broken ankle and now part of a crowded backfield that includes rookies Alex Collins and C.J. Prosise, many experts are cool on Rawls' chances of a big Year 2. Not Beacom, who ranked Rawls inside the top 10. For what it's worth, I asked Rawls recently if he had any advice for fantasy owners this year. His answer? "I'm going to bring everything I have to the table in 2016. Don't miss it."

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust	Ezekiel Elliot
Top Fantasy Rookie	Corey Coleman
Comeback Player of the Year	Tony Romo/Eddie Lacy
Long-Shot Player	Zach Zenner
Stay-Away Player	Carlos Hyde

First Round Bust: On the surface Elliot is as well rounded a running back as we'll see. My issue with him is we haven't seen him run at the NFL level. The Cowboys signed Alfred Morris in the offseason, and Darren McFadden is coming off one of his best seasons of his career. In a day and age where the position has a committee on 75-80 percent of teams, drafting Elliot in the first round is more risky than anything else. Will he produce? Yes. Will he be a top 10-12 running back in fantasy land? Most likely. However, I want my first-round pick to be a foundation with a level of certainty.

Gutsy Picks: There's been plenty of handwringing about a disappointing season from Atlanta Falcons tailback Devonta Freeman in 2016, including from Heath Cummings of CBS Sports. "Freeman did get off to a spectacular start to 2015,"

Cummings said, "but he was pretty mediocre in the second half. Everything we're hearing out of Falcons camp suggests Tevin Coleman will be involved in the offense early in the season." Lonero isn't hearing it – he was the only pundit who had Freeman in his top 5.

Lonero is similarly high on a veteran running back who's a fair bit longer in the tooth than Freeman. After LeSean McCoy of the Buffalo Bills struggled with injuries last year and failed to hit 1,000 yards on the ground the mumbles started that maybe Shady's days in the fantasy sun were done. Lonero disagrees in 2016. One of only two voters who ranked McCoy in the top 10, Lonero has McCoy highest on his board at RB7.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust	DeAndre Hopkins
Top Fantasy Rookie	Corey Coleman
Comeback Player of the Year	Eddie Lacy
Long-Shot Player	Eric Rogers
Stay-Away Player	Kelvin Benjamin

First-Round Bust: Hopkins' targets will decrease by 50-plus after Houston simultaneously downgraded their quarterback and upgraded their running game, defense, and complementary receivers.

Gutsy Picks: Brandon LaFell recently told ESPN when he looks at Cincinnati Bengals quarterback Andy Dalton he sees – Tom Brady? "Both of those guys are smart guys," LaFell said. "They always have the offense in the right play. They're always getting the ball to the right person at the right time. They're two different offenses, but both of those guys are winners." Kelley isn't going that far, but he was the only ranker who threw The Red Rifle into his top 10 (QB8).

Kelley went out on a similar limb with New England Patriots tailback Dion Lewis, ranking him eighth at his position. Lewis told the Boston Herald he's eager to build on last year's injury-shortened breakout. "I just wanted to be back so bad," Lewis said. "When I come back I want to be me and that's the only player I know how to be is me. And I think working hard will help me be me quicker."

Bakay is a writer, actor, comedian, commentator and sportscaster whose work spans television, books, and film. He's also a well-known NFL fan and fantasy football maven. In the meantime, Nick fills his days writing, acting, and contributing to ESPN and NFL.com. Nick wrote the box-office hits "Paul Blart, Mall Cop" and the sequel, "Mall Cop II". He is also the Executive Producer of the CBS comedy "Mom," starring Anna Farris. But it's not keeping him from his annual contribution to the Cheat Sheets and the hunt for his next magazine league title after last earning championship honors in 2008.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust	Dez Bryant
Top Fantasy Rookie	Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year	Le'Veon Bell
Long-Shot Player	Isaiah Crowell
Stay-Away Player	Eddie Lacy

Stay-Away Player: Take it from a fat guy: When you're only 26 years old and your coach has to put you on a diet, something's terribly wrong. ... But that's what it came to after Lacy broke a lot of fantasy hearts and recliner chairs in 2015. What's that you say? He reported to camp 12 pounds lighter? Well whoop-eee-doo! You and I both know he's one bratwurst binge away from three bills and a 5.3 forty. 'Bama players are crapping the NFL bed right and left; compound this with a Packers line that simply doesn't run block very well, and you've been warned.

Gutsy Picks: Bakay may be best known as a comedian, but he isn't joking even a little bit about rookie tailback Ezekiel Elliott of the Dallas Cowboys. As in ranked him No. 1 at the position not joking. Mike Mayock of the NFL Network agrees that a huge first year for Elliott could be on tap. "A couple years ago DeMarco Murray carried the football 449 times and had 2,200 yards," Mayock said after the draft, "and I think Elliott is a better football player."

This isn't to say Bakay is all about the shiny new toys. An unsettled QB situation has left a bit of a stink over the wide receivers for the New York Jets, but Bakay apparently isn't repelled by the odor. He slotted the consistently productive and mercurial wideout Brandon Marshall seventh – highest of any of our experts. Just so long as he doesn't catch a whiff of BO in the hair. If that happens the date is off, and Salem is bouncing post-haste.

Subscribers have varying needs and 4for4.com covers all aspects of fantasy football, from season-long leagues to industry-recognized DFS tools. That said, the No. 1 thing 4for4 brings to the table is our consistently accurate rankings and projections – week after week, year after year. Senior Editor John Paulsen (@4for4_John) was named the Most Accurate Fantasy Football Expert by FantasyPros for the 2010 and 2014 seasons. He has finished in the top 5 in five of the last six seasons resulting in the No. 1 rankings accuracy from 2010-2015. FantasyPros has also found that John had the most accurate draft rankings over the past two seasons. In addition to great rankings, 4for4 subscribers get access to Draft Analyzer, customized rankings, and a host of reports and tools designed to give our subscribers a championship edge.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust. . . . . .Rob Gronkowski
Top Fantasy Rookie . . . . . Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year . . . . . .Jordy Nelson
Long-Shot Player . . . . . Zach Miller
Stay-Away Player . . . . . .Jordan Reed

First-Round Bust: It's not that I don't believe Gronkowski will produce like a first-round pick, it's just that the position is so deep this season that it isn't worth it to use a first rounder on a tight end. It's better to use that first rounder on a running back or a wide receiver and then draft Delanie Walker, Coby Fleener, Zach Ertz, Ladarius Green or Dwayne Allen in the eighth-10th rounds.

GUTSY PICKS: As Todd Haislop of The Sporting News passed along, quarterback Tyrod Taylor has turned the position from a weakness to a strength for the Buffalo Bills. "His 99.4 rating, 67.84 QBR and 8.0 yards per attempt, Haislop wrote formed a better stat trio than that of Andrew Luck, Cam Newton and Aaron Rodgers in their respective first seasons as full-time starters." Paulsen views Taylor as a starter, too – he's the only ranker who slid Taylor in among the fantasy QB1 crowd.

A running back ranked 42nd probably isn't going to win any fantasy owners their leagues, so it might not seem newsworthy to mention that Paulsen slotted Darren Sproles of the Philadelphia Eagles there. Still, that's more than 15 spots higher than any other expert on our panel ranked the veteran scatback, so if nothing else Paulsen is significantly higher than most on Sproles.

Bold Predictions

First-Round Bust. . . . . Jamal Charles
Top Fantasy Rookie . . . . . Ezekiel Elliott
Comeback Player of the Year . . . . . Torrey Smith
Long-Shot Player . . . . . Kenny Bell
Stay-Away Player . . . . . Thomas Rawls

Top Fantasy Rookie: Obviously, opportunity presages success for rookies. However, there are other data points in evaluating these neophytes: athletic ability, pass blocking skills, catching capability and offensive teammates. In the past decade, Ezekiel Elliot has the paramount combination of all the aforementioned rationale to succeed as a rookie. The offensive line ranks among the best in the NFL, and the aerial combination of QB Tony Romo and WR Dez Bryant must be the focus of defensive game plans. The former Buckeye star runs well in gap and zone-blocking schemes and is a three-down back. Without question, Elliot touches the ball 300 times in 2016.

Gutsy picks: Elliott Harrison of NFL.com thinks Arizona Cardinals running back David Johnson is set for big things in 2016. "When Chris Johnson got hurt last year, this guy came in and was a beast for them, Harrison said. "Bruce Arians is aggressive, but sometimes that gets mistaken for being aggressive only passing. He loves to run the football. The Cardinals were 10th in run-pass ratio last year." Laub's in agreement – he has Johnson as fantasy's top RB in 2016.

Mark Morales-Smith of FanSided predicted not long ago that tight end Jordan Reed of the Washington Redskins would be the biggest bust at the position this season. "Aside from his injury woes," he said "I also have concerns with his quarterback Kirk Cousins. There are just too many red flags surrounding Reed to draft him in the third round as the No. 2 TE." Laub agrees – but only with that last part. He has Reed ranked as the No. 1 option among tight ends this year – ahead of Gronk.

	Nick Bakay NickBakay4Real	Jim Sannes FanDuel.com	Alessandro Miglio Footballguys.com	Tim Heaney USAToday.com	Andy Behrens Yahoo! Sports	Justin Lonero Fantasy Goodfellas
1	Antonio Brown (WR) Drafting first means it's time to keep it simple, stupid. In a PPR, Brown is absolutely the right choice. Yes, No. 1 overall picks often trip up, but that still doesn't mean you don't pick 'em.	Odell Beckham (WR) If I can't land Antonio Brown, I'll happily settle for Beckham. His rare combo of touchdown potential and floor is hard to duplicate, and the best may be yet to come.	Julio Jones (WR) The argument at the top of fantasy heap this season is Jones vs. Antonio Brown. With the latter gone, the choice was elementary.	Le'Veon Bell (RB) His knee rehab aside, only RB I'm comfortable taking in first half of PPR first round. 70 catches, 2,000ish total yards on the horizon for a full season.	David Johnson (RB) Johnson is a high-usage featured runner tied to an elite offense, and his skills as a receiving threat are well-established. He caught 36 balls last year, plus another 15 in the postseason.	Dez Bryant (WR) Dez Bryant has on average a stat line of 90/1300/12-15 TDs. This is what I want in a first-round pick to help build a foundation or core. I expect an angry and hungry Dez in 2016.
2	LeSean McCoy (RB) The waiting is indeed the hardest part, and it did a serious number on the WRs, so I focus on the RBs. Debated Doug Martin, but McCoy has the better upside and catches more balls.	Jamaal Charles (RB) I'd be willing to take Charles early in the second, so getting him late in the round is superb. Even coming off injury, Charles' involvement in the passing game is huge for his value.	Devonta Freeman (RB) The key to fantasy success this season is to stack Atlanta Falcons, right? The value here was too good to pass up, not to mention he caught 73 passes last year.	Amari Cooper (WR) Second-half drop-off was rookie wall collision. But first year was still stellar (72-1070-6). Potential generational talent in high-octane offense makes him possible top-5 wideout in 2016.	Demaryius Thomas (WR) Thomas hauled in 105 receptions for 1304 yards last season, his second straight year reaching triple-digit catches. He's survived worse QB situations than this year's mess.	Brandon Marshall (WR) Historically Brandon Marshall has played in all 16 games in his ten year career. With a gun slinging Ryan Fitzpatrick, Marshall should once again have one hundred receptions, twelve hundred yards, and close to ten touchdowns.
3	Jordan Reed (TE) Yes, I'm tempted by T.Y. Hilton or Brandin Cooks, but I am looking to stock my starting lineup with explosive players who can dominate, and Reed and his double-digit TDs are my best option.	Brandin Cooks (WR) Cooks showed the second half of last year what he can do when he's used down the field. With Drew Brees still at quarterback, it's hard not to have confidence in this offense.	Doug Martin (RB) Martin isn't much of a pass-catcher, which probably factored into why he fell to the third round after his resurgence last season. My running backs are set.	Jarvis Landry (WR) Touchdown production needs to climb, but it in PPR, he's a high-end second wideout with many weeks as a first. After 111 last year, has averaged 97.5 receptions in his first two seasons.	Mark Ingram (RB) Ingram caught 50 passes over just 12 games last season, emerging unexpectedly as a PPR asset. Health has been an issue throughout his career, but his per-game production is tremendous.	Jeremy Maclin (WR) Jeremy Maclin will be the Chiefs' No.1 wideout for a second straight year after posting a 87/1088/8 stat line. I view him as a high end WR2 on an offense that needs his play making ability.
4	Matt Jones (RB) As you can see, I am bullish on Washington's offense, and Jones is a young back on the rise, now free of Albert Morris. With a little less fumbling I might have struck PPR gold.	Emmanuel Sanders (WR) The quarterback situation is frightening in Denver, but Emmanuel Sanders was still functional last year when the production was down. He's not a player I'm targeting, but he's a decent value in the late fourth.	Larry Fitzgerald (WR) One of the best receivers of his era was seventh in PPR scoring last season on one of the best passing offenses in the league, but it's like he caught the plague in fantasy drafts.	Latavius Murray (RB) Not really a PPR dynamo, but he oozes talent as a speedy big body. Should duplicate quiet 1,000-yard season and get closer to 10 scores. Undervalued.	C.J. Anderson (RB) Running back wasn't a priority for my team at this stage, but Anderson was the top flex on my board by a wide margin. He averaged 6.3 YPC in the second-half last season.	Dion Lewis (RB) Mainly I drafted Dion Lewis because he reminds me of Barry Sanders in terms of shiftiness, but if he is healthy he could be at the top for receptions amongst running backs this season.
5	Jordan Matthews (WR) We start three wideouts, so it's time to fill the bag. Mathews is the last true No. 1 left. Who knows what the hell Philly's offense is doing this year, but he's gonna get his targets.	John Brown (WR) Even with relatively low market shares, Brown has been productive the past two seasons. There's upside in all three of the Cardinals' receivers, but Brown's big-play ability makes him my favorite.	DeSean Jackson (WR) This is certainly a boom-or-bust pick, and I will likely just start him in plus matchups. But if anybody in Washington is going to get open deep and make the odd big play, he's it.	Danny Woodhead (RB) One of 2015's best PPR backs. Melvin Gordon's surgery is his latest setback. Woodhead's already the better back, even around the goal line. He's a lock for 50-plus catches -- nice flex blanket in a PPR.	Michael Floyd (WR) When healthy last season, Floyd routinely saw 8+ targets per game, delivering five 100-yard performances in the second-half. He's an obvious candidate to deliver a career year.	Giovani Bernard (RB) Gone are Mohamed Sanu and Marvin Jones, and someone will need to pick up those catches. Bernard will have 50 receptions this season. He is a safe RB2 perfect for PPR scoring.
6	Marvin Jones (WR) Jones is one of my top hunches for 2016. We have yet to see Golden Tate pull of being the No. 1 guy, the Lions are a great passing offense, I think this could get interesting.	Jeremy Langford (RB) There's always the worry that Langford will lose his job in the Chicago offense, but those fears are baked into his current draft position. His upside, however, may not be.	Tyler Eifert (TE) His ankle injury has depressed his draft stock, but Eifert is a touchdown machine when he is healthy. He'll be back sooner than later, too.	Dorial Green-Beckham (WR) A bit of a stretch, but it's for a big-bodied sleeper with ample big-play and touchdown upside. Wideouts were running thin, so I had to get My Guy.	Josh Doctson (WR) Among all receivers in this year's rookie class, Doctson offers by far the best combination of talent and team context. He has terrific size, hands and leaping ability. Don't be surprised by double-digit TDs.	Aaron Rodgers (QB) In a world where we can wait late for a quarterback I had to pull the trigger on the game's best. Jordy Nelson will be back, and Rodgers has 40-45 touchdown upside.
7	Coby Fleener (TE) I'm always looking for players on the verge of exploding, so I grab the new Jimmy Graham. Don't be shy about grabbing that second TE early, Fleener could be an awesome PPR Flex starter.	Jeremy Hill (RB) Hill was beyond frustrating last season, but he still tied for the league lead in touchdowns. His lack of involvement in the passing game is a concern, but the touchdown upside is immense.	Russell Wilson (QB) This being a mix of fantasy experts, quarterbacks went later than usual. You might have to reach a bit earlier to secure Wilson's services.	Tyler Lockett (WR) As my fourth receiver, Lockett is a bonus. He could be what we hoped Percy Harvin would become. Seattle's suddenly lethal passing game will have a new weapon as he builds on his strong finish to 2015.	Ben Roethlisberger (QB) Over Ben's last 21 games, dating back to October 2014, he's averaged 335 yards and 2 TDs per week, completing 68 percent of his throws. That's ridiculous. His receiving weapons are among the league's best.	Frank Gore (RB) He has rushed for 1,000 yards in eight of the last 11 seasons. Despite being 33, Gore is seemingly ageless, and he'll receive plenty of carries and receptions. Volume, opportunity, and job stability.
8	Ameer Abdullah (RB) I'm smelling a serious drop-off at RB if I don't grab one here, Abdullah is a much better option in PPR leagues and has a shot at elevating his game in 2016.	Travis Kelce (TE) My basic strategy has been to snag whichever tight end between Ladarius Green, Zach Ertz, or Kelce falls to me in the eighth round. Kelce was the last available, making this decision easy.	Karlos Williams (RB) Folks started taking favorite sleepers at this juncture, so I felt compelled to take Williams and his 5.6 YPC and 14.3 percent touchdown rate here, regression likelihood and all.	Blake Bortles (QB) Rounds 7 and 8 are where QBs start to look good for value. Bortles' breakthrough could calm with a better run game, but he'll remain a top-10 slinger as an aerial and ground weapon.	Ladarius Green (TE) Green found an ideal landing spot in Pittsburgh, setting himself up for a potential top-3 fantasy finish at his position. I'm fairly sure I'll land either Green or Coby Fleener in every draft.	Sterling Shepard (WR) I was looking for a fourth wideout with upside and the time was Round 8. I have no doubt he will be second on the Giants in targets and receptions right out of the gate.
9	Carson Palmer (QB) Time to grab an elite, proven QB. Bruce Arians loves him some vertical game, Palmer is huge in this system with tons of weapons. The old/fragile factor decries I get some solid depth later on.	Melvin Gordon (RB) First-round running backs don't simply disappear after one bad season. If it weren't for off-season knee surgery, I'd be happy taking Gordon in the sixth round, so the ninth is totally acceptable.	Gary Barnidge (TE) Replicating a magical 2015 season is going to be tough for Gary Barnidge in Cleveland, but this felt like a good spot to grab my Eifert insurance.	Theo Riddick (RB) Detroit grabbed more possession receivers, but with Calvin Johnson retiring, they'll need as much catch consistency as they can get. Riddick adds another fine PPR weapon to my bench with Woodheadian numbers.	Tavon Austin (WR) Austin is an explosive, versatile weapon, the only L.A. receiver who deserves serious fantasy consideration. Jeff Fisher has made off-season noise about Austin doubling his catch total -- seems crazy, but Goff has to throw somewhere.	Julius Thomas (TE) There is a sea of mediocrity at TE after Gronk. I wanted a piece of the Jags' passing game at a cheap price. JT has 29 touchdowns over the last three seasons.
10	Pierre Garcon (WR) I have zero WR depth, so I try to fill my bench. Garcon is a bit of a forgotten man, but I love what Gruden has going in Washington, so I throw the Hail Mary.	Breshad Perriman (WR) Our draft occurred right before Perriman suffered yet another knee injury. You can't help but feel bad for him and hope that his luck eventually turns around so he can flash his talents.	Travis Benjamin (WR) Benjamin might be in my lineup early in the season given the propensity for San Diego's secondary receivers to go off early in the year.	Martellus Bennett (TE) Rob Gronkowski has lacked a positional complement for some time. New England's receiving corps is injured or inexperienced. Bennett, a matchup nightmare inside the 20, should pick up the slack and quickly charm Tom Brady.	Chris Ivory (RB) Touchdowns still count in PPR leagues, right? Great, just making sure. Ivory clearly doesn't get a value bump from this scoring format, but he's still likely to cross the goal line 7-10 times.	Stefon Diggs (WR) I was told this was the top value pick in the whole draft by Matt Kelley. Many will gravitate towards the rookie Treadwell a few rounds earlier. I'll take the rapport Diggs has with Teddy Bridgewater already.
11	Isaiah Crowell (RB) I think Crowell could be Hue Jackson's answer to what Jeremy Hill provided in the Bengal offense. Here's your TD vulture, and he can catch the ball, too.	Mohamed Sanu (WR) There aren't many players to garner targets in Atlanta outside of Julio Jones and Devonta Freeman. Although Sanu was inefficient in Cincinnati, he should see enough volume to contribute in 2016.	Justin Forsett (RB) As of now, Forsett is the starter in Baltimore. I would bet that changes, but this isn't a bad spot to take him just in case he locks that gig down.	Devontae Booker (RB) With health, the rookie could take a chunk or all of C.J. Anderson's lead back production. Though not flashy, Booker boasts decisiveness and precision -- something Gary Kubiak appreciates for his RB-friendly system.	Philip Rivers (QB) Rivers led the league in pass attempts in 2015 and finished second in yards, and he's averaged 31 touchdowns per season over the past three years. A healthy Keenan Allen will be a boost.	Bilal Powell (RB) Another receiving running back to my arsenal. Yeah I know Matt Forte is a Jet now, but Powell will be in the mix and I'm guessing he'll average 5-6 receptions per game regardless.
12	Ted Ginn (WR) Desperate for WR depth, I take a shot at a guy who is ranked far below his performance in 2015. Yes, there are younger options for Cam Newton, but Ginn is a trusted weapon.	Michael Thomas (WR) I didn't necessarily want Thomas considering I already had Cooks, but he's another mid-round wide receiver with tremendous upside. Not many guys in this range are in offenses as explosive as the Saints'.	Rishard Matthews (WR) Matthews was underappreciated in Miami, and now he will get a chance to shine as a starter with the Titans, where it appears he's in line for a starting role.	DeAndre Washington (RB) Murray's handcuff. Not just a role player, though Washington flashes electricity in space. Oakland's offense is a true sleeper, so I don't mind owning the freshman for flex purposes. In PPR, he'll play better.	Jerick McKinnon (RB) It seems a little mean-spirited to draft another owner's handcuff, I'll admit, but I'm a big fan of McKinnon's potential. He emerged as an effective rotational back for the Vikes last season.	Kendall Wright (WR) While I'm loaded at wide receiver already, this pick was a flier. There is a crowded wide receiver corps in Tennessee now, but 60 catches will do just fine this late as my WR6.
13	Terrance Williams (WR) Another guy we all seem to forget about, Williams strikes me as pretty good value in Round 13. Now that Tony Romo is back and healthy (at least for now) this could actually work.	Matt Ryan (QB) Ryan was awful for fantasy last year, but the overcorrection in his draft position is hard to comprehend. He's still a quality quarterback with a lot of weapons, and he's a steal this late.	Charcandrick West (RB) Jamaal Charles is coming back from his second torn ACL. West flashed some serious production potential last season, and the Chiefs extended him. Why not here?	Brandon LaFell (WR) Should hold off rookie Tyler Boyd. LaFell dropped plenty of passes last year, but he can steal many weeks of production. Someone has to be A.J. Green's sidekick, especially with Tyler Eifert hurt.	Denver (DEF) Defensive fantasy scoring is driven by sacks and turnovers, so I'm perfectly happy to snag Von Miller & Co. in Round 13. This defense still features elite talent at all levels.	Derek Carr (QB) I love Derek Carr as my QB2! He is a lock for 30 touchdowns and 4,000 yards in 2016. He has a bright future playing pitch and catch with Amari Cooper.
14	Tyrod Taylor (QB) Another explosive, undervalued player. Taylor starts his first season as the undisputed No. 1 with a season in Greg Roman's offense under his belt. No. 13 PPG last year, I project bigger and better things.	Will Fuller (WR) Fuller is another player who should contribute thanks to a lack of competition for the team's No. 2 wide receiver role. If he's available this late, he's worthy of a spot on your bench.	Ryan Tannehill (QB) Adam Gase could help push Tannehill firmly into the top 10 in fantasy scoring this season. As backup quarterbacks go, you can hardly do better.	Sammie Coates (WR) Who'll fill Martavis Bryant's job? Coates has impressed so far in off-season activities with his size and speed. He profiles as the downfield asset Ben Roethlisberger will love. Definition of sleeper.	J.J. Nelson (WR) Nelson is a burner who flashed plenty of ability last year, and Bruce Arians has raved about him in the offseason. He's a perfect system fit for Arizona, an ideal late lottery ticket.	Eric Ebron (TE) Who is going to grab Megatron's targets, receptions, and touchdowns? My guess is Ebron will get a small piece of the pie. I'll use a committee approach week to week between Ebron and Julius Thomas.

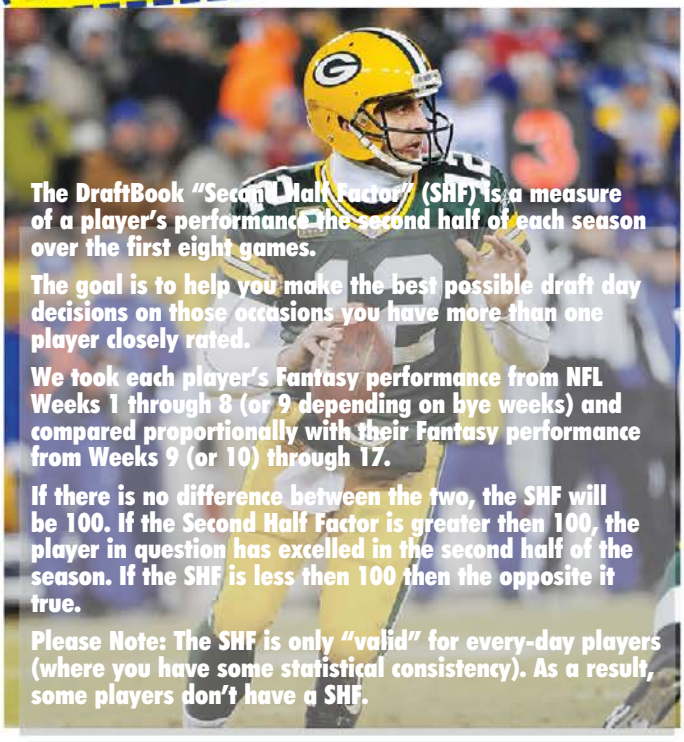
DeAndre Hopkins (WR) Last year, Hopkins totaled 111 catches for 1,521 yards and 11 touchdowns on 192 targets from a carousel of quarterbacks, so he should benefit since the team has tabbed Brock Osweiler to be its starter.	A.J. Green (WR) Green is my WR4, so I was pumped he fell toward the end of the first. I debated Lamar Miller, but in PPR Green and his increasing target share were too much to pass up.	Allen Robinson (WR) While Robinson may look like Dez Bryant 2.0 and dearly represents the future of the wide receiver position, he will likely regress in 2016. Indeed, Allen Robinson will regress from being exceptional to extraordinary.	Todd Gurley (RB) I certainly didn't expect Gurley -- my RB1 -- waiting for me here. Not much of a decision given that. I'm hoping he'll catch more passes this year, but either way, a very satisfying pick.	Ezekiel Elliot (RB) In the year of the wide out, I'll journey down the road less travelled. By the end of the fifth round, I covet two RBs on roster. Elliot is a no-brainer first rounder.	Adrian Peterson (RB) Few liked Peterson heading into 2015, and it appears the same is true heading into 2016. At pick No. 12 not sure I can go wrong, though, with the game's most consistent fantasy back.	1
Lamar Miller (RB) Miller has back-to-back top-10 finishes at his position while averaging only 15.5 touches per game in that span. Houston likes to run the ball, so Miller should average around 20 touches if healthy.	Jordy Nelson (WR) It was Nelson or Lamar Miller here, but I opted to go WR with this being PPR. Not only should Nelson get 80-90 catches, but he's averages 0.75 touchdowns per game with Aaron Rodgers.	Keenan Allen (WR) Allen is DeAndre Hopkins West. Both players ooze je ne sais quoi in their route running precision and strength at the catchpoint. Both players crested 20 PPG in 2015, but Allen was more efficient.	Alshon Jeffery (WR) Although he struggled to remain on the field, there's no questioning what happens when his playing. Over his last 16 games, Jeffery has 95 catches, 1,314 yards and 11 touchdowns. Worth the perceived risk here.	Mike Evans (WR) The Buccaneers playmaker scored 14 times as a rookie and only four times last season: Evans bounces back and crosses the finish line at least 10 times.	Rob Gronkowski (TE) They all zig, so I zag. The run on WR in this draft was predictable, but the cupboard was bare by this point. Why not take the clear No. 1 fantasy tight end??	2
T.Y. Hilton (WR) In 22 games over the past two seasons with a healthy Andrew Luck, Hilton has averaged 5.1 catches for 86 yards and 0.45 TD. Those are fringe WR1 numbers in PPR formats.	Eddie Lacy (RB) Yes, I'm a Packers fan, but in-shape, healthy Lacy is a stud. He was the PPR RB2 from Week 7 -17 in 2014 and is in a contract year, so I loved the value.	Julian Edelman (WR) The rock. Edelman is a 100-catch WR who has yet to post a 100-reception season. Edelman's 2015 TD-rate is unsustainable, but he remains an elite PPR producer with a mere third round price tag.	Sammy Watkins (WR) Despite a slow start, Watkins was unstoppable over the final nine weeks last season, posting a 49-900-7 line. A broken foot suffered in May might mean another slow start; hoping for another strong finish though.	Golden Tate (WR) The Lions' wideout recorded back-to-back 90-catch crusades on over 270 targets. Without Calvin Johnson, Tate ascends to the top of the summit in Detroit.	Randall Cobb (WR) Cobb should actually perform better with Jordy Nelson back in the lineup, and while he's a so-so No. 1 fantasy receiver I was pleased to see him still on the board here.	3
Matt Forte (RB) He's changing teams, but OC Chan Gailey likes to use his running backs in the passing game, and Forte hasn't finished outside the top 12 at his position in eight career seasons.	Donte Moncrief (WR) Wide receivers were flying off the board, so I grabbed a high-upside option to complement my top two pass-catchers. I prefer Moncrief to T.Y. Hilton at their current ADPs in 2016.	Eric Decker (WR) The metronome. Four rounds, four top-12 PPR PPG wide receivers. The least volatile, most reliable producer in all of fantasy was only available in the fourth round, because of uncertainty at the quarterback position.	Carlos Hyde (RB) Hyde is determined to show he can be the sturdy, productive rusher who racked up 168 yards and two touchdowns in last season's opener. Chip Kelly will give him every opportunity to do that.	Doug Baldwin (WR) Seattle's wideout is not likely to replicate his 14 TDs from last season, but Baldwin is the alpha dog in the passing game and likely to garner over 100 targets.	Kelvin Benjamin (WR) Not entirely sold on Benjamin (or the Panthers 2016 passing attack) but he was the best available receiver here. He will be the team's top receiver by default.	4
Michael Crabtree (WR) Last year, Crabtree was the No. 17 receiver in PPR formats and is playing in an ascending offense with an improving quarterback.	Ryan Mathews (RB) I was sniped by Justin Lonero two picks earlier, as I really wanted Giovani Bernard. My hope with Mathews is he stays healthy becomes a poor man's Jamaal Charles in Doug Pederson's Eagles offense.	Allen Hurns (WR) High volume wide receiver duos are a groovy hedge. I love The Allens: a southern rock back from the 70's featuring two harmonizing front men guitarists who carry their erratic drummer, Blake Bortles.	Greg Olsen (TE) Olsen has led the Panthers in both receptions and yards for three consecutive years. In addition, 79 red-zone targets as a Panther have led to 21 TDs. Olsen is a rock-solid elite fantasy TE.	DeMarco Murray (RB) After consecutive 1,000-yard crusades, Murray crashed and burned in Philly: Coach Mike Mularkey wants to play smash-mouth and the newest Titan gets nearly 300 touches.	Kevin White (WR) Lot of upside. White was a high draft pick before losing his rookie season to injury. If he returns to full health, and clicks with Jay Cutler, this will be a good value.	5
DeVante Parker (WR) Over the past two seasons, new HC Adam Gase has overseen excellent fantasy production from Demaryius Thomas and Alshon Jeffery in the big "X" receiver role in his offense. The ascending Parker fits the bill.	Duke Johnson (RB) Johnson had 60 receptions as a rookie, and is a better pure runner than the inconsistent Isaiah Crowell. If he gets more work between the tackles under Hue Jackson, he'll be a huge bargain here.	Corey Coleman (WR) The upside play. Coleman is closely comparable to OBJ but more electric. As Cleveland's No.1 WR, a 1200-yard season is reasonable, particularly with Josh McCown at quarterback (RG3 has always been a gimmick quarterback).	Jay Ajayi (RB) The Dolphins seem content rolling with Ajayi as their featured back -- at least for this year. Based on HC Adam Gase's run-heavy approach in Chicago and Denver, Ajayi will be a very busy man.	Cam Newton (QB) My goal was to delay drafting a quarterback; nevertheless, I could not bypass the value of last year's fantasy MVP in the sixth round.	Thomas Rawls (RB) Similar to the Kevin White pick, this is all about upside, but not without risk. Rawls has big time injury concerns, but if healthy should inherit Marshawn Lynch's workload.	6
Delanie Walker (TE) Last year, Walker led all tight ends in targets and finished third in fantasy scoring. While his numbers may regress a bit, he should continue to be a primary target for QB Marcus Mariota.	Torrey Smith (WR) Throw out 2015. Smith is a good player, and the No. 1 wideout in Chip Kelly's offense (which has finished as the WR20, WR9 and WR10 since 2013). If this backfires, I blame Matt Harmon.	Jonathan Stewart (RB) What if I told you a primary running back on a high scoring offense with 97th percentile speed score was available in seventh round? Stewart finished top-5 in rushing yards per game in 2015.	Willie Snead (WR) Multiple players sniped from me. This wasn't as much a panic pick as a "I don't wanna take anybody here pick." I'd settle for even a slight increase over last year's 69-984-3 line.	Zach Ertz (TE) The 35th overall selection in the '13 Draft exceeded expectations down the stretch last season. New coach Doug Pederson incorporates TEs, and Ertz soars high.	Markus Wheaton (WR) The Steelers' passing attack will spread the ball around more this year. That's good news for Wheaton, who doesn't need to worry about losing reps to Martavis Bryant.	7
Andrew Luck (QB) Luck finished eighth, sixth and first in fantasy scoring in his first three seasons. He seems likely to bounce back now that he's fully healthy, and he has a host of offensive weapons to utilize.	C.J. Prosise (RB) I took some heat for going Prosise over Andrew Luck, but Prosise is for sure the pass-catching back in Seattle, and could win the starting gig outright. I'm all about that upside in PPR.	Charles Sims (RB) Sims is the rare non-primary running backs who offers standalone value as a featured receiver in the passing game while also possessing top-10 RB upside if Doug Martin suffers a major injury.	Drew Brees (QB) Had to pair somebody up with Snead, didn't I? Okay, this had more to do with the fact Brees has tossed at least 30 TDs for eight straight seasons. He is scary consistent.	Laquon Treadwell (WR) The former Rebel ranks atop my rookie prospects, and he immediately becomes QB Teddy Bridgewater's object of affection. He easily harvests 110 targets in 2016.	Tom Brady (QB) The run on quarterbacks was unavoidable, and I didn't mind pushing it along with Brady. He may not have Andrew Luck's upside (or popularity among fantasy owners), but he's the safer pick.	8
Rashad Jennings (RB) The Giants got away from their perplexing four-headed RBBC towards the end of the year. They fed Jennings the ball 21.5 times in that span, and he responded with 130.3 total yards per game.	Derrick Henry (RB) Didn't intend to go back-to-back rookie running backs, but I loved Henry's ceiling as well. H's a better pass-catcher than people think, and could usurp the starting job from DeMarco Murray by midseason.	T.J. Yeldon (RB) Yeldon was shockingly elusive posting a 35.8-percent juke rate (evaded tackles per touch) top-10 in 2015. Then, Jacksonville shocked him by signing Chris Ivory. Regardless, Yeldon he will be active in all passing situations.	Eli Manning (QB) Manning has averaged 4,421 yards, 32.5 touchdown passes, 14 interceptions and completed 62.8 percent of his passes in two years with Ben McAdoo calling play -- well above his career averages. Odell Beckham's presence helps.	Kenneth Dixon (RB) Offensive coordinator Marc Trestman's playbook relies heavily on running backs as effective receivers, and Dixon's pass catching abilities warrant ninth-round value.	Nelson Agholor (WR) All about depth and upside. Agholor showed very little in his first season, but he now gets a fresh start with a revamped passing attack and new coaching staff.	9
Steve Smith (WR) If healthy, Smith will be the WR1 for the pass-happy OC Marc Trestman. Before he ruptured his Achilles in Week 8, Smith was the No. 10 receiver in PPR formats.	Dwayne Allen (TE) I wanted Antonio Gates, but Allen was a fine consolation prize. He's been the best tight end in Indy since 2012, and now has all of the targets to himself with Coby Fleener gone.	Tevin Coleman (RB) I leveraged a pure Zero RB draft concept, which is predicated on drafting upside RBs in the later rounds. Coleman looks Jamaal Charles running the ball and Jamaal Charles with boxing gloves catching it.	Antonio Gates (TE) Last year Gates caught 56 passes for 630 yards and five touchdowns in 11 games. Fellow TE Ladarius Green moved on the Steelers and Gates might have another top-5 season in him.	Tyler Boyd (WR) The former Pittsburgh standout will surely be counted on to replace the targets and receptions (153 and 98) vacated during the offseason by M. Jones and M. Sanu.	Paul Perkins (RB) Looooong shot, no question. But ask yourself: Which returning Giants running back excites you? Perkins may not make the team, or he may be the late- round surprise fantasy owners crave.	10
Shane Vereen (RB) In his first season with the Giants, Vereen caught 59 passes for 495 yards and four touchdowns, which gives him spot-start RB3/RB4 value in PPR leagues.	Zach Miller (TE) After doubling up on Colts pass-catchers, I sought TE depth with Miller. Since 2013, Jay Cutler has thrown roughly 24 percent of his targets to tight ends, and Miller is the unquestioned starter.	Vincent Jackson (WR) Jackson is an athletic specimen evidence by a 100th percentile SPARQ Score who will be the same age as Larry Fitzgerald this season with a similar ceiling.	DeAngelo Williams (RB) Williams showed enough last year to spell Le'Veon Bell this year. That might not help me much, but if Bell is hurt or gets off to a slow start? I'll make out like a bandito.	Javorius Allen (RB) Wanted to lock down the Baltimore backfield: Either Dixon or Allen will be the opening day starter and both are now on the roster.	Phillip Dorsett (WR) The 2015 first-round pick was a bust in his rookie season, but few receivers make an immediate splash. The Colts' receiving corps is a bit less crowded, and Dorsett is a bit more seasoned.	11
Chris Hogan (WR) The 6-1 Hogan impressed at off-season activities and is a good bet to fill the Brandon LaFell "X" receiver role in the New England offense. Fantasy starter numbers may follow.	Tony Romo (QB) Romo led a top-5 scoring offense in Dallas in 2014 and 2013 (finishing as the QB11 and QB10 respectively). With a healthy Dez Bryant and Ezekiel Elliott in tow, he was a safe pick.	LeGarrette Blount (RB) Blount is the ultimate RB match-up play, and am impossible value in the 12th round. Start him against soft defensive fronts and bench against stout run defenses, particularly on the road.	Jordan Howard (RB) Not everybody believes Jeremy Langford will be the man in Chicago; if he's not, Howard likely will be. If nothing else, the 230-pounder looks to be an ideal complement to Langford. He'll see some action.	Devin Funchess (WR) During the last seven regular season games, Funchess became a valuable commodity, catching 19 of 36 targets and scoring four TDs: A prime late-round selection.	Jimmy Graham (TE) On a team full of injury question marks, why not add another?? Graham is two years removed from fantasy stardom, but if healthy could be much better in 2016 than his first season in Seattle.	12
Seattle (DEF) The Seahawks have finished in the top 5 in defensive scoring in four straight seasons and have the talent, experience and home field advantage to do so again.	Kamar Aiken (WR) Believe it or not, Aiken was 11th in the league in receiving yards from Week 10-17 last year, albeit thanks to heavy volume. Baltimore's WRs are far from settled, so he was worth a shot.	Arian Foster (RB) All Foster does is score fantasy points, and his ADP will surely pop in August. An Achilles injury is not a death sentence, because Foster wins with nuance and niftiness, not speed and burst.	Mike Wallace (WR) Baltimore will give Wallace the most chances to run straight down the field, which is what he does best. Nobody throws deep more often than Joe Flacco. We'll see if Wallace can maximize the opportunity.	Jameis Winston (QB) Coach Dirk Koetter and the Buccaneers' personnel department have assembled some young and exciting talent on offense, and Jameis Winston will orchestrate an underrated unit.	Marcus Mariota (QB) Would have preferred Jameis Winston but not terribly disappointed to land Mariota here. Tennessee is committed to the rushing attack and that favors his strength; the receiving corps is also slightly improved.	13
Kirk Cousins (QB) Last year's No. 9 quarterback should continue to progress as a real-world passer. He has one of the better receiving corps in the league, featuring DeSean Jackson, Jordan Reed, Pierre Garcon and rookie Josh Doctson.	Andy Dalton (QB) Backed up Romo with Dalton, who was the QB5 before his thumb injury last year. I don't think it was just Hue Jackson, either. Dalton has turned a corner and could surprise in 2016.	Jeff Janis (WR) The super-ultra-mega sleeper. From humble beginnings at Saginaw Valley State to NFL Playoffs hero, Janis personifies the American Dream. Janis' talent profile checks all the boxes -- it is only a matter of time.	Josh Gordon (WR) Two words: Massive upside. Of course, he has to be reinstated by the NFL and we won't learn that outcome until August at the earliest. A gamble. But it's Round 14.	Darren McFadden (RB) In Dallas, Darren McFadden provides the perfect protection for my first-round selection (E. Elliot). I can relax and enjoy the production behind the Dallas O-line.	Kansas City (DEF) Not my top choice for fantasy defense, but the Chiefs' aggressive style is appealing. The team's loaded pass rush and solid corners offer big-number potential for any given week.	14



The DraftBook "Second Half Factor" (SHF) is a measure of a player's performance the second half of each season over the first eight games.

The goal is to help you make the best possible draft day decisions on those occasions you have more than one player closely rated.

We took each player's Fantasy performance from NFL Weeks 1 through 8 (or 9 depending on bye weeks) and compared proportionally with their Fantasy performance from Weeks 9 (or 10) through 17.

If there is no difference between the two, the SHF will be 100. If the Second Half Factor is greater then 100, the player in question has excelled in the second half of the season. If the SHF is less then 100 then the opposite it true.

Please Note: The SHF is only "valid" for every-day players (where you have some statistical consistency). As a result, some players don't have a SHF.

Two seasons ago, injuries and missed games kept Newton out of the top 5 fantasy quarterbacks for the first time since joining the league in 2011. Even without top target Kelvin Benjamin, a healthy and refocused Newton set the league on fire last season. En route to winning the NFL MVP award, Newton threw for 35 touchdowns and more than 3,800 yards. On the ground he exceeded 600 rushing yards and added 10 more touchdowns. Newton is in a great position to retain his throne atop the quarterback position. In addition to getting Benjamin back, Cam has helped to make Greg Olsen one of the game's best receiving tight ends. Spice in some added development for second year wideout Devin Funchess plus the erratic, but explosive, plays from Ted Ginn and Newton can continue his aerial and ground scoring assault on the league.

It's hard to call a 30-touchdown season a disappointment, but that's exactly what Rodgers was in 2015. Over the last six regular-season games he scored just a single touchdown on four occasions while barely averaging 220 passing yards. The offensive line was bad, but Rodgers has posted big seasons behind worse. Perhaps the biggest issue was Randall Cobb failing to step up following Jordy Nelson's season-ending knee injury. It also didn't help matters that Eddie Lacy was grossly out of shape and Davante Adams was historically bad in ways we may never truly understand. That being said, let's not forget that Rodgers was fantasy's No. 1 or No. 2 quarterback in all but one season from 2008-14, and that shortfall was due to injury. Rodgers rarely throws picks, gets Nelson back for Week 1, and is so good he might even be able to get something out of newly-signed tight end Jared Cook.

3) Drew BREES — NOR

Age, mileage, and a developing shoulder issue sparked concerns about a serious decline for Brees, especially after he began 2015 with a single touchdown in four of his first six games. Then there was an outburst of seven touchdowns against the New York Giants in Week 8. From there, Brees had multiple touchdowns in six of the final eight games. That hot second half was sparked by Brandin Cooks' breakout with a dose of Willie Snead thrown in. History says Brees is going to keep flirting with 5,000 passing yards with more than 30 touchdowns and double-digit interceptions in 2016. In a surprising move, veteran tight end Ben Watson was replaced with Coby Fleener after Watson's bounce-back season. The team is also looking to get something out of C.J. Spiller, an expensive free agent that never got going after a preseason knee injury.

One year after sharing the league lead with 4,952 passing yards, Roethlisberger averaged a career-best 328.2 yards per game in 2015. That figure works out to more than 5,200 yards over a full 16-game season. However, Roethlisberger could only stay healthy for 11 starts, which makes his 16 interceptions really stand out. The Pittsburgh offense had significant home and road splits, although that's likely just noise given the small sample of games. Losing Martavis Bryant for an entire season, however, is a very real issue. On the plus side, the offense gets Le'Veon Bell back and added tight end Ladarius Green via free agency to replace the retiring Heath Miller. If his health was guaranteed, Roethlisberger might be in contention as the first QB drafted this season.

With a career passing rating of 101.8 that puts him second only to Aaron Rodgers (104.1) on the all-time list, Wilson is so darn efficient it's exciting to think about what kind of raw numbers he's capable of posting if Seattle passed the ball more frequently. Despite a publicly-stated desire to keep pounding the ball on the ground, perhaps we'll see a shift toward throwing it after all. Thomas Rawls is coming off a broken ankle and rumored to be out all preseason. The team invested a third-round pick in running back C.J. Prosise from Notre Dame, a converted wide receiver capable of making big plays out of the backfield or when lined up as a wideout. Last year, Wilson only threw the ball 13 more times than Alex Smith. Yet his production, despite fewer rushing yards when compared to 2014, saw Wilson finish as fantasy's No. 2 quarterback. Wilson rarely throws interceptions, but does put the ball on the ground, leading the league in fumbles in both 2013 and 2014 -- about the only bad thing we can say about him.

At 36 years old, Palmer put together the best season of his career in 2015 with more than 4,600 passing yards and 35 touchdowns. Unfortunately, he played poorly at times down the stretch while dealing with a thumb injury suffered in Week 15. Seattle limited him to 12 of 25 passing with a mere 129 yards in Week 17, and the Cardinals' playoff run ended in disappointing fashion as, Carolina picked Palmer off four times in the NFC Championship game. Age and injury history will suppress Palmer's cost on draft day. However, even if Larry Fitzgerald doesn't extend last year's resurgence into this season there's still a very high ceiling here. Palmer has the emerging David Johnson coming out of the backfield and a pair of young, explosive deep threats in Michael Floyd and John Brown.

Even though the Giants have been 6-10 each of the last two years Manning's play has never been better. That syncs up with the arrival of former offensive coordinator and new head coach Ben McAdoo. A wide receiver named Odell Beckham Jr. was drafted around that time as well. Taking Sterling Shepard out of Oklahoma in the second round of this most recent draft finally gives the Giants a legitimate second weapon behind Beckham. As for Manning, he comes into the season sporting consecutive campaigns of 4,400 passing yards and a career-best 35 touchdown passes. Outside of reducing his interceptions there doesn't appear to be much room for growth. That said, Manning should once again challenge for a spot in the bottom half of the top-10 fantasy quarterbacks.

Colts Owner Jim Irsay made the announcement himself via Twitter on June 29: "Andrew has signed through 2021." The five-year extension pays Luck more $75 million over the first three years and slightly less the next two. Luck's $16.2 2016 salary this season remains intact. Luck's deal makes him the highest paid player in the NFL. The $25 million mark per year over the first three years seems reasonable enough given his age, productivity and leverage even with Luck coming off the worst season of his four-year NFL career. He missed nine games due to rib, shoulder, kidney and abdominal injuries. But in each of his first three seasons led the Colts to records of and the playoffs. The No. 1 pick in the 2012 draft, Luck has thrown 101 career touchdown passes and has twice posted seasons of more than 4,300 passing yards. For what it's worth, recent reports indicate Luck has fully recovered from the lacerated kidney that ended his 2015 season early. And that's good news for fantasy owners who will certainly benefit from a lower that usual price tag given Luck's disappointing 2015 campaign.

After playing all of 2015 and leading the league with 36 passing touchdowns, Brady may be unable to stave off his four-game suspension any longer. This comes after his punishment was reinstated by the U.S. Second Court of Appeals back in April. The threat of suspension last year had Brady going outside of the top five at quarterback in fantasy drafts, the pending reality should keep him in similar territory this time around. The wait could prove to be worth it, however. Last year, Brady threw for multiple touchdowns in 13 of his first 14 games. This offseason saw New England trade for disgruntled Martellus Bennett. And Brady may end up needing him as Julian Edelman underwent a second surgery on his broken foot after the team was adamant he wouldn't need one. Running back Dion Lewis is coming off a torn ACL. Both players are expected to be available for Week 1, however, although the Patriots are rarely forthcoming with accurate information.

Stumbles and struggles in the season's second half have cost Rivers in recent years. For a quarterback that seems to get a lot of criticism, Rivers is eighth all-time on the career passer rating leaderboard. In fact, he's within one point of Tom Brady and nearly tied with Drew Brees. Last year Rivers continued to play well despite an absurd amount of injuries at receiver and horrific offensive line play. Indeed, Rivers led the league in both pass attempts and completions. More things to like regarding Rivers' prospects in 2016: Keenan Allen was playing really well before he suffered a lacerated kidney mid-season, Danny Woodhead is still in the backfield (making up for Melvin Gordon not scoring touchdowns), Stevie Johnson can still produce from the slot and Antonio Gates has been timeless. Add free agent speedster Travis Benjamin to the mix, and things look even rosier.

After a pretty brutal rookie season, Bortles opened a lot of eyes in year two. Jacksonville shifted to an explosive passing offense built around throwing the ball to their outstanding trio of weapons in Allen Robinson, Allen Hurns, and Julius Thomas. This allowed Bortles to exceed 4,400 passing yards with 35 touchdowns and 18 interceptions, a figure that was magnified by five games with three or more interceptions. A poor defense led to a lot of garbage-time production from the offense and a heavy amount of the team's passing touchdowns came in the red zone, where rookie running back T.J. Yeldon struggled. That now changes with incoming free agent power back Chris Ivory. While it's exciting to ponder how the Jags offense could improve upon last year, the young group may have a tough time scoring passing touchdowns at the same clip, despite off-season talk of increasing the offensive tempo in 2016.

Cousins' first full season as a starter came in year four and the wait was worthwhile. He led the league with a completion percentage of 69.8 percent and threw at least one touchdown in every single game. On five occasions he tallied multiple scores. Cousins got serious fantasy attention during a late season barrage that totaled 11 TDs over the final three regular season games. Jordan Reed returning from an early season concussion and emerging as an elite tight end helped to fuel the breakout. The second half schedule was also very favorable, and a fair criticism when forecasting Cousins for 2016 considering the QB's eight interceptions over the team's first seven games last year. Washington added Josh Doctson from TCU in the first round of April's draft to bolster the receiving corps, as both DeSean Jackson and Pierre Garcon are entering the final year of their contracts.

Even though it seems like half the league makes the Pro Bowl these days, Derek Carr made the trip in his second pro season after finishing the year with 3,987 yards and 32 touchdowns. He connected with rookie Amari Cooper for than 1,000 yards despite the rookie's late-season fade. In his first year on the other side of the bay, Michael Crabtree revitalized his career playing with Carr to the tune of 922 yards and nine touchdowns. While Carr was indeed better in year 2, he'll need to surpass 4,000 yards to warrant weekly fantasy consideration. The offseason saw Oakland flex their cap space muscle to further improve on both sides of the ball. The addition of tackle Kelechi Osemele, formerly of Baltimore, while also retaining tackle Donald Penn now gives the Raiders one of the best offensive lines in the league. Carr has the weapons and protection to take another step forward in his development.

After two respectable seasons to begin his career, Dalton was a top-5 fantasy quarterback in 2013. He reverted to vanilla play the following year, struggling when A.J. Green was slowed by injury. The 2015 edition of Dalton was the best we've seen so far until it ended prematurely thanks to a broken thumb. He opened the season with multiple touchdowns in five of the first six games with just two interceptions. Dalton even added a pair of rushing scores during that span. Cincinnati lost both Marvin Jones and Mohamed Sanu in free agency but signed the enigmatic Brandon LaFell and drafted Tyler Boyd out of Pittsburgh in the second round. A full season from tight end Tyler Eifert would boost Dalton's prospects even further, but the tight end underwent ankle surgery in late May and is likely to miss several games. As long as Green is on the field, Dalton is a solid QB2 with the ability to achieve more.

Don't be surprised if somebody reaches for Taylor in your drafts. He's just one of those guys people can go crazy for. Four games with three passing touchdowns and a weekly threat for rushing production will do that sometimes. Just keep in mind that Taylor never topped 300 passing yards in a game last year. Even though backups EJ Manuel and rookie Cardale Jones are no threats to Taylor's playing time, Buffalo is not talking about a contract extension for Taylor heading into the final year of his current deal for a reason. A scrambler like Taylor is going to leave plays on the field. Perhaps improving his fundamentals will lead to that long-term agreement with the team, but Sammy Watkins' broken foot could seriously dampen things.

You know the NFL is a passing league when rookie quarterbacks can throw for more than 4,000 yards and receive very little fanfare. Winston did just that in 2015 to the tune of 4,042 yards and 22 touchdowns. There were 15 interceptions, but four games with multiple picks isn't a shock coming from a first year player. The underappreciated part of Winston's game is rushing touchdowns, which appears to be a real thing. As a rusher, Winston has only averaged about 10-15 yards per game both in college and as a pro. Yet when the end zone is in sight he's willing and able to put the ball over the goal line himself. Seven times in 27 collegiate games at Florida State and six times in his first 16 pro games. A more efficient connection to Mike Evans could open the door for a lot of optimism moving forward. However, Vincent Jackson is 33 years old and missed six games last year and promising tight end Austin Seferian-Jenkins has yet to play a full season.

Mariota had his rookie season limited to 12 games after suffering MCL injuries in each knee. His production was erratic, which is understandable for a developing quarterback on a really bad team. The highs included four games with three or more touchdowns scored. The lows included five games without a passing touchdown. Overall, running wasn't a big part of the game plan despite Mariota's dynamic abilities. As for the weapons around their franchise quarterback, the team appears to be banking on another strong showing from veteran tight end Delanie Walker. That and perhaps a Dorial Green-Beckham breakout as Rishard Matthews was the only notable addition at wide receiver. Something resembling a running game would also take a load off Mariota. To that end the Titans made a deal for DeMarco Murray and drafted Derrick Henry in the second round. New head coach Mike Mularkey should utilize Mariota's running ability and things are improving, but still expect peaks and valleys in Mariota's game logs.

Romo turned 36 in April and is coming off a season in which he broke his collarbone twice. His favorite target, Dez Bryant came back too soon from a broken foot and needed additional foot and ankle surgeries during the offseason. Dallas would ultimately like to go back to the 2014 formula with rookie Ezekiel Elliott playing a better version of DeMarco Murray. Romo was extremely accurate and efficient that year leading the league in completion percentage, yards per attempt, and quarterback rating. However, from a fantasy perspective it's hard to get excited investing in a passing offense that is playing to avoid shootouts. The injury concerns for both Romo and Dez only dampen the outlook.

We've now seen Ryan for eight seasons and 2012 remains the only one in which he threw for more than 30 touchdowns. Last year's 21 touchdowns marked his lowest output since his rookie season. This is pretty depressing stuff for a guy that's typically accurate with his throws and has an elite playmaker in Julio Jones, who led the league with 136 catches and 1,871 yards. Somehow this pairing only managed to connect on eight touchdowns in 2015. After sticking with Roddy White for one season too many, Atlanta attempted to revamp its receiving corps by signing Mohamed Sanu in the offseason. From there they drafted tight end Austin Hooper out of Stanford in the third round and took a flier on speedster Devin Fuller from UCLA in the seventh. At this point we have enough evidence to believe that Ryan is only worth a look as a streaming option when matchups are in his favor.

The change to offensive coordinator Jim Bob Cooter changed everything for Stafford and the Detroit offense in the second half of 2015. The final six games saw Stafford throw 17 touchdowns to just one interception. Of course Calvin Johnson retired, but we've seen Golden Tate play really well without Megatron, albeit over a small sample of games. Marvin Jones was signed away from Cincinnati as a free agent. He scored 10 touchdowns on just 51 catches in 2013. He missed all of 2014 with injuries, but played well returning to action last year. Perhaps the true No. 2 target in Detroit is running back Theo Riddick, who caught 80 balls last year. Even young tight end Eric Ebron has flashed at times. Perhaps moving on from Johnson won't be as daunting of a challenge as it seems.

New head coach Adam Gase managed to extract quite a bit from Jay Cutler last year as the offensive coordinator in Chicago. Now Gase will need to balance being a first time head coach while trying to work similar magic with Tannehill. Thankfully, there are some interesting targets, namely Jarvis Landry, to help. Last year's first round pick, DeVante Parker, displayed his ability in flashes over the final six games last season after returning from a foot injury. The Dolphins also used a third round pick on Leonte Carroo from Rutgers. His intrigue comes from having scored 29 touchdowns in 30 collegiate games. Tannehill began last year with 13 touchdowns in six games, yet only squeaked out 11 more scores in the final 10 games. Among the lower end fantasy quarterbacks, it's pretty easy to envision Tannehill taking a big leap forward.

A complete disaster is the simple recap of Flacco's (and the Ravens') 2015 season. Steve Smith, Sr. tore his Achilles in Week 8. Week 11 saw Flacco tear his ACL and MCL ande running back Justin Forsett breaking his arm. This year's roster, however, has a bunch of options to target in the passing game. Unfortunately, there's really no clarity yet on how things will develop. 29-year-old deep threat Mike Wallace was signed in the offseason. Veteran tight end Benjamin Watson was also brought in after his career year in New Orleans. Breshad Perriman was last year's first-round pick, but he never got on the field due to a knee injury and suffered a new one this offseason. And don't forget Kamar Aiken, who showed a little something last year when he became the lone survivor at wide receiver. While there are plenty of options to throw at the ceiling is limited. Flacco has never thrown for 4,000 yards or 30 touchdowns in any of his eight NFL seasons.

Last year, Cutler only had one game in which he threw for three touchdowns, but let's give him a modest golf clap for posting the best QB rating of his career. Unfortunately, Adam Gase has left Chicago to become the head coach in Miami. The departures extend to the field as well. Tight end Martellus Bennett was traded to New England during the offseason, a move that was made easier after Zach Miller showed some flashes down the stretch last year. Also gone is veteran running back Matt Forte, who has been a steady target coming out of the backfield his entire career. For Cutler to have any chance of fantasy success he'll need the talented, but always banged up, Alshon Jeffery to stay on the field and he'll also need to get contributions from Kevin White, who had his rookie season wiped out due to injury. The odds of everything working out that smoothly aren't great. Through 10 seasons there's yet to be a 30-touchdown year from Cutler, although he has led the league in interceptions twice.

Using Alex Smith as your fantasy quarterback is like kissing your sister, or an equivalent family member. Over the last two years, Smith has thrown for only 18 and 20 touchdowns respectively. In those 31 combined games, he's recorded zero touchdowns seven times and a single score 11 times. Smith did run for a career-high 498 yards last year, but there's really no upside because Smith doesn't take many chances down the field. Somehow, Smith found a way to get Jeremy Maclin over 1,000 receiving yards last year, but his biggest pass plays seem to be Jamaal Charles' screen passes that get broken for long touchdowns. Unleashing Travis Kelce would be a very welcome sight, especially after the success Smith had with Vernon Davis in San Francisco. Unless there's a shift in philosophy to open things up, Smith remains a weak streaming option regardless of matchup.

Prior to his four-touchdown outburst against Chicago in Week 15, Bridgewater was in danger of failing to throw for double-digit touchdowns in 2015. It's really hard to imagine that happening in the NFL's passing game era, especially to a QB playing for a good team. During the first four games of the year, rookie Stefon Diggs averaged 10 targets and more than 100 yards per game, but things fell off, as the final nine contests saw fewer than five targets per game. After realizing how poorly deep threat Mike Wallace fit with Bridgewater's limited arm the Vikings released Wallace in the offseason. First-round pick Laquon Treadwell from Ole Miss is a more complete player that can become a possession receiver and more. That being said, Minnesota still wants to pound the ball on the ground with Adrian Peterson and play great defense. Aerial production is not a priority within the team's game script.

Being the starting quarterback for Houston isn't a bad thing. Last year, Brian Hoyer had seven multi-touchdown games in 11 appearances. Unfortunately for Texans' fans, his only game with multiple interceptions came at the very worst time -- a four-pick day against Kansas City in the playoffs. During the offseason, the Texans signed Osweiler to a big contract, even though the 6-7 QB has a grand total of 11 NFL TD passes. While Houston features DeAndre Hopkins in the passing game, they drafted wide receivers in the first and third rounds: Notre Dame burner Will Fuller and Ohio State conversion project Braxton Miller. Fellow free agent signee Lamar Miller is capable of catching the ball out of the backfield, while rookie running back Tyler Ervin from San Diego State suits that style of play extremely well. Osweiler is still something of an unknown, but the pieces are falling in place to give him every chance to succeed.

Fitzpatrick wasn't on the Jets' roster as we went to press. In fact, it's possible that he won't be there in Week 1, despite setting career highs in passing yards and touchdowns on the way to winning 10 games for Gang Green in 2015. However, Fitzpatrick told SiriusXM Radio he'd like to go back to the team this year -- if the money's right. "It was probably my best season last year in terms of how much fun I had with the guys, out there every Sunday," he said. "It's something I still really enjoy doing, it's something I want to continue to do. I'm playing. I'm playing football next year. I would like to be back (in New York)." His beard was unavailable for comment. Contract impasse aside, there's little chance we make it all the way through the summer without the 33-year-old coming to terms with the Jets. And assuming that's the case, early drafters willing to roll the dice will be able to get fantasy football's 11th-ranked quarterback a year ago at a deep discount. If Fitz doesn't return, the Jets are ready to roll with Geno Smith.

Colin Kaepernick's status has drawn most of the headlines this offseason. Gabbert, meanwhile, has quietly gone about impressing teammates and new coach Chip Kelly with his willingness to serve as a leader on and off the field. In addition, Gabbert got in the bulk of the off-season work with Kaepernick limited while he recovers from three surgeries. While there will be a competition in August, Gabbert seems to have the edge. As Kelly pointed out, "You look at his skill set. He took off against the Bears and went (44) yards for a touchdown. He ran 4.61 in the combine when he was coming out. He's big. I'd never really dealt with Blaine because he came into the league before I came into the league, but just how big and physical and impressive he is. He's a 6-4, 245-pound guy that can really run." Nobody should be in a rush to invest draft capital in whoever wins this job, but the competition will have an impact on the supporting cast.

The Eagles gave fantasy owners some clarity on their QB situation heading into 2016 in March by agreeing to terms with Bradford on a new two-year deal. Then they muddied the waters by trading up in the draft to select Carson Wentz with the second pick overall. Still, the plan calls for Bradford to start all of 2016 while Wentz watches from the sidelines gaining his NFL bearings. The good news? Bradford set new franchise records with 346 completions and a 65.0 completion percentage last season. He did so despite missing parts of three games after injuring his left shoulder and suffering a concussion in Week 10. Bradford's second season in Philadelphia will be his first under HC Doug Pederson and OC Frank Reich, but Bradford will have the advantage of another year of working with the Eagles' assortment of skill players. Bradford has already developed a level chemistry with players like Jordan Matthews and Zach Ertz in 2015 and will now look to build on that under his new contract -- assuming he holds onto the starting job.

The DraftBook "Second Half Factor" (SHF) is a measure of a player's performance the second half of each season over the first eight games.

The goal is to help you make the best possible draft day decisions on those occasions you have more than one player closely rated.

We took each player's Fantasy performance from NFL Weeks 1 through 8 (or 9 depending on bye weeks) and compared proportionally with their Fantasy performance from Weeks 9 (or 10) through 17.

If there is no difference between the two, the SHF will be 100. If the Second Half Factor is greater then 100, the player in question has excelled in the second half of the season. If the SHF is less then 100 then the opposite it true.

Please Note: The SHF is only "valid" for every-day players (where you have some statistical consistency). As a result, some players don't have a SHF.

Gurley sat out the first two games of the season as he worked his way back from an ACL tear suffered while playing in his final season at Georgia. He was barely used in his Week 3 NFL debut but exploded over the next four games en route to Offensive Rookie of the Year honors. During that four-game run he averaged close to 6.5 yards per carry on 22 attempts per game. Gurley slowed down a bit in the final eight contests, yet continued to score touchdowns in all but two lopsided games in which he only saw 18 combined carries. The only concern with Gurley heading into 2016 is his lack of involvement as a receiver. This is a team that's likely going to be trailing in a lot of games. That fact could lead to the kinds of negative game scripts that burned Gurley owners last year in the aforementioned blowouts.

2) Ezekiel ELLIOTT — DAL

EXP. ROOKIE YEAR AGE: 20 HT: 6-0 WT: 225 BYE: 7

The outstanding offensive line that aided DeMarco Murray in rushing for over 1,800 yards and 2,261 yards from scrimmage in 2014 is now blocking for a much more talented player that intrigued Dallas so much, they drafted him in April with the fourth overall pick. Indeed, Elliott is good enough to immediately be a three-down back at the professional level. In addition to possessing good pass catching abilities, Zeke is a very willing and aggressive blocker. The only downside for fantasy owners with taking Elliott is the possibility of his being stuck in a stagnant Cowboys offense should Tony Romo (who broke his collarbone twice last year) and/or Dez Bryant (who broke his foot twice last year) miss extended periods of time again.

Johnson came into the NFL draft considered to be a very good receiving back from a smaller school, but there were questions about his running abilities. He began the season as a situational player, yet scored six touchdowns in the first five games. Chris Johnson's fractured tibia in Week 12 thrust the rookie into the starting role the rest of the way. Johnson exploded through his first three games as the Cardinals' main man, albeit against varying degrees of poor run defenses. On the season, Johnson's high-water mark was his Week 15 performance highlighted by 229 total yards of offense and three touchdowns against a Philadelphia team that was playing out the string for a coach they had tuned out. Over the team's final four games, including a pair in the playoffs, Johnson struggled mightily to the tune of 3.2 yards per carry. Thankfully, his receiving ability salvaged those outings and will continue to provide a safe fallback to his weekly stat line for PPR owners.

A torn MCL and PCL in Week 8 against Cincinnati ended what was developing into a second consecutive outstanding season for Bell. While the 24-year-old has posted videos on Twitter of himself dunking a basketball and working out, his availability to start the season on time remains in doubt. However, Bell continues to state he'll be able to fully participate once training camp opens. If so, the concerns surrounding his knee should be downgraded and his position on fantasy draft boards will stabilize. Prior to the knee injury, Bell was averaging more than 125 combined yards through five games. That's down from 2014's ridiculous 138.4 yards per game, but still outstanding.

Last year at age 30, Peterson led the NFL in rushing for the third time in his career and only needed 1,485 yards to do it. That's the lowest mark for a league leader since 2007. Peterson exceeded 100 rushing yards in seven games and added another double-digit touchdown campaign to his Hall of Fame resume. On the season he averaged a healthy 4.5 yards per carry and has never averaged worse than 4.4 yards per carry in a full season. Despite comments about his willingness to catch the ball, the team seems content with Jerick McKinnon replacing Peterson on the field in passing situations. Despite the advancing age, Peterson is the safe answer for those looking to avoid a rookie (Elliott), a running back coming off injury (Bell) or who aren't willing to commit to one with a limited track record (Gurley).

Fantasy owners longed to see Miller used as a workhorse in Miami, but he only got to carry the ball more than 20 times twice over his four seasons with the Dolphins. Thankfully, Houston appears willing to atone for this unconscionable wrong by using him to run both inside and outside, and involving him in the passing game. While he may not be the second coming of Arian Foster, it's not absurd to think Miller is capable putting up some very big games now that he's finally being unleashed. Houston did use a fourth-round pick on Tyler Ervin from San Diego State -- an explosive scat back that the team can deploy as a backfield receiver. The other running backs in the stable are unimpressive holdovers from a year ago and no challenge to Miller's bell-cow status.

Aided by a monster game of 251 rushing yards and four touchdowns against a hapless Oakland defense, Martin's rookie season in 2012 saw him run for a total of 1,454 yards and 11 touchdowns. Over the next two years, however, Martin only managed to total 950 yards while missing 15 games with a torn labrum in addition to ankle and knee sprains. After Tampa Bay declined the fifth-year option on his rookie deal, Martin responded in 2015 by exceeding 1,400 yards en route to earning himself a new five-year contract. While a healthy Martin has been able to produce at a high level running the ball, the receiving opportunities will continue to go to Charles Sims. It's the opposite knee, but Charles is coming off the second torn ACL of his career. The first one was back in 2011 and saw Charles return the following year with a career-high 1,509 rushing yards and 5.3 yards per carry. This time around, however, he's approaching 30 years old and returning to his former self may not be quite as likely. After Charles went down, Kansas City patched it together with the combination of Charcandrick West and Spencer Ware, winning all 10 of their remaining regular season games. Charles probably won't be ready for the start of training camp but is expected to suit up for Week 1. The 5.5 yards per carry average over his career is difficult for fantasy owners to overlook despite troublesome injury developments.

Ingram enters Year 5 having only played a full 16-game schedule once. Over the years he has missed multiple games with a sprained toe, a broken hand, and most recently a torn rotator cuff. It's unfortunate because after a sluggish start to his career, Ingram had been starting to put it all together over the last two years. Last season he displayed previously-untapped ability as a receiver. That part of the game projected to be the responsibility of C.J. Spiller, but he never looked right after undergoing arthroscopic knee surgery before the start of the season. Tim Hightower, last seen back in 2011, was brought in and eventually replaced Ingram after he was deemed out for the season. Hightower returns on a one-year contract after performing surprisingly well in the team's final four games.

Last year, McCoy missed two early-season games with a hamstring injury and the final two contests with a torn MCL. During the 12 games he played, Shady was a very consistent player, thanks in large part to his abilities as a pass catcher. Meanwhile, McCoy was still fine as a runner too, posting more than 110 rushing yards in three games. When looking at total yards from scrimmage he exceeded the 85-yard mark on 10 occasions and 100 yards eight times. McCoy turned 28 years old over the summer, so he's not at the edge of the running back cliff just yet. Those that simply look at last year's final line of 895 rushing yards and three touchdowns could easily assume that McCoy is washed up and move along. Don't make that mistake. Be ready to capitalize on a potential value should he slide on draft day.

Lacy could be in danger of becoming the NFL's version of Pablo Sandoval. While there has been plenty of offseason talk about Lacy losing weight he was still over 240 pounds during OTAs. Staying conditioned during the season will also be a key to fending off James Starks should Lacy's weight issue remain a concern. Even when Lacy was at his best, which we may never see again, he lacked true explosiveness. He was a volume runner on a really good offense that was afforded red-zone opportunities while coming off the field in passing situations.

After rushing for 100 or more yards in three consecutive October games, Freeman was limited to fewer than 15 carries and 50 yards in four of his next five. He also missed one game due to a concussion. That Week 12 contest allowed rookie Tevin Coleman, who has a better draft pedigree than his teammate, to rush for 110 yards on 18 carries. While he's not in imminent danger of losing the starting job, Freeman is a smaller guy that could prove to be something of a one-hit wonder. Despite that crazy stretch early in the year, Freeman ended the season averaging just 4.0 yards per carry. Coleman probably deserved more touches than he saw in 2015 and could be an underrated challenge to Freeman's opportunities going forward.

During the regular season, Anderson only managed to exceed 70 rushing yards in four games. On their path to a Super Bowl victory, however, he topped that mark in all three of Denver's playoff games. In addition to Ronnie Hillman randomly catching fire in a few games, injury may have played a factor in Anderson's usage and production prior to the playoff run. While he didn't technically miss any games, Anderson was on the injury report seven times with four different ailments over the course of the season. Denver gambled with Anderson in free agency, ultimately matching Miami's mid-level offer while retaining Hillman on a cheap one-year deal. A more realistic challenger, perhaps in the second half of 2016, is fourth-round pick Devontae Booker. He is a possible three-down back recovering from a torn meniscus that cut short his second monster season in Utah.

Hyde's second season was cut short due to a stress fracture in his left foot that he suffered in Week 5. The injury was originally diagnosed as a bruise, and he was allowed to play the next two games but understandably struggled, sometimes collapsing to the ground untouched. Despite the injury and having absolutely nothing to play for, the 49ers waited one month from the date of the injury to finally place Hyde on season-ending injured reserve. New head coach Chip Kelly has said all the right things about Hyde, who's dropped 10 pounds in the offseason. While Kelly's up-tempo offense leads to playing a lot more snaps, this is a bad team that could be on the wrong end of many lopsided scores leaving, leaving little reason or opportunity to run the ball in the second half.

After several seasons in which he never saw the field due to injury, Lewis emerged in 2015 as a pass catching dynamo. New England loved what they saw in him so much that he was given a two-year extension after only three games. Unfortunately, Lewis tore his ACL in Week 9 and his role was given to second-year man James White, who was barely serviceable. Lewis should be ready for Week 1 and was moving well during minicamp. Early down bulldozer LeGarrette Blount suffered a season-ending hip injury in Week 14 but was re-signed to a one-year deal in April. The Patriots appear to like the depth chart just fine after not drafting or signing a running back during the offseason. Fantasy owners may once again have to guess which New England back to start on any given week, however.

This offseason Miami was connected to a lot of free agent running backs yet never got a deal done. That leaves them with Ajayi, last year's fifth-round pick, as the presumed starter. Despite what is basically a bone-on-bone condition in his right knee, Ajayi was a workhorse for two years at Boise State. While he broke the occasional checkdown pass for a big play, Ajayi doesn't offer much else as a receiver. To that end, Kenyan Drake was taken in the third round out of Alabama. That's a steep price for what was essentially a complementary player in college, perhaps speaking further to the concerns Miami has at running back. Ajayi should get every opportunity to handle the early down usage while losing time to Drake in obvious passing situations.

Forte is changing teams at the age of 30. The former Chicago Bear signed with the Jets in free agency, a team that is currently very conflicted at quarterback. Offensive coordinator Chan Gailey was a miracle worker last year and could apply his next master stroke to Forte's fortunes. As he did back in 2013, Bilal Powell made small but valuable contributions last year as the primary receiving back. How Forte and Powell ultimately split those pass catching duties will impact their respective PPR values, but Forte is the favorite to see the bulk of the team's targets out of the starting gate.

At 32 years old Gore finally looked like an old player in 2015. On 260 carries, fifth-most in the league, he averaged far and away a career-worst 3.7 yards per carry. Despite only collecting 967 yards, the mark was still good enough to finish inside the top 10 among rushers. However, things could improve for Gore. For starters, Indianapolis finally addressed some of their offensive line issues with high draft picks. Add in a healthy Andrew Luck and the entire outlook of the offense changes. That doesn't raise the ceiling for Gore all that much, though. He's a risky NFL senior citizen with an outside chance at 1,000 yards.

Tennessee liked Murray enough to trade for him but still invested their second-round pick on Derrick Henry, who was a total beast during his Heisman-winning junior season at Alabama. There's also talk of keeping Dexter McCluster involved as well. Those worries aside, Murray is at least going back to a scheme that will simply him to get downhill. The lateral demands in the Chip Kelly run game were never altered to accommodate the stiff and bulky Murray, making the acquisition highly suspect from the start. The 2014 breakout season with Dallas that came before the move within the NFC East remains the only time in which Murray played the entire schedule. While the move to Tennessee is a good one for Murray in term of Xs and Os, a number of concerns are also attached.

Add Hill to the list of former second-half heroes that fell short the following year. Hill ended 2014 with three consecutive 100-yard rushing games, giving him five over the final nine games. In 2015, despite four games with multiple touchdowns, Hill never had a 100-yard day. In fact, he only averaged 33.6 yards per game in the first 10 contests. Giovani Bernard is the one that got a three-year contract during the offseason after starting his career off with three consecutive years with more than 1,000 yards from scrimmage. Hill might be the ultimate player in a best ball or touchdown-only format. Guessing when the scoring binge will happen on a week-to-week basis will lead to more misses than hits.

How differently might we view Murray had he never scored that 90-yard touchdown against Kansas City back in Week 12 of 2014? Sure, he reached 1,000 yards last year, but he never had a game with multiple touchdowns. Murray only averaged 4.0 yards per carry and wasn't very involved in the passing game. On the plus side, Murray is heading into a contract year and might have the best offensive line in the league playing in front of him. However, team support for Murray in the media has been fairly minimal, which makes the selection Deandre Washington in the fifth round of April's draft interesting. He's undersized but had two strong seasons at Utah. Derek Carr was second on the team in carries last season so the door is definitely open for a secondary rusher to take away some of Murray's touches, even in a complementary role.

Despite a career average of 4.5 yards per carry, Mathews has been often been a headache to own over six pro seasons because his name seems to be a staple on the injury report every week. However, the departure of DeMarco Murray via trade to Tennessee pencils Mathews in as the projected starter in Philadelphia. If that is the case, he would be placed ahead of two interesting scat backs: veteran Darren Sproles and rookie Wendell Smallwood, a fifth rounder from West Virginia. Despite losing a ton of offensive snaps (that would have come with another year of Chip Kelly running the show), a healthy Mathews could be very effective under new head coach Doug Pederson.

His season ended up being similar to 2013, his first with the Chargers. The year in-between was ended in Week 3 due to a broken fibula. Last year's bounce back is very encouraging, but Woodhead only averaged 3.4 yards per carry and is now 31 years old. Melvin Gordon was bad as a rookie. Like, really bad. Didn't score a single touchdown bad. In addition to passing situations, Gordon was also taken out in favor of Woodhead when the team got into the red zone. While age is a factor, Woodhead's role in San Diego is secure and continues to be perfectly suited for PPR leagues.

Even though last year's third-round pick out of Miami wasn't even targeted in his first two games, Johnson ended up as Cleveland's No. 3 receiver when all was said and done. Duke should repeat in that capacity, this time behind tight end Gary Barnidge and rookie wide receiver Corey Coleman. On a team with such limited options, new head coach and former Cincinnati offensive coordinator Hue Jackson could be looking at using Johnson as his new Giovani Bernard. Stewart was putting together the best season of his injury-plagued career when he had yet another lower-body issue in Week 14. Over the course of his career he's been on the injury report with ailments to the knee, ankle, toe, and most recently a foot. J-Stew was able to return for the playoffs and played well in the first two games before re-injuring the foot in the Super Bowl. Stewart will be 29 years old and far from a lock to repeat the eight consecutive starts with 20 or more carries like he did last year. In addition to his durability issues, last year's 4.1 yards per carry is Stewart's worst output in any of the six seasons in which he has played 13 or more games. Even though he was inactive for two of the team's playoff games, Cameron Artis-Payne will get another chance to find a niche in his second year.

In three professional seasons, Bernard has exceeded 1,000 yards from scrimmage every year. In the two seasons in which he played all 16 games, Gio surpassed 1,200 yards on both occasions. Last year came with a career-best 4.7 yards per carry and 9.6 yards per reception on the 66 targets he saw from Bengals' quarterbacks. Jeremy Hill still got his touchdowns but looked pretty bad in the process. Cincinnati let their money do the talking about their feelings about this backfield when they awarded Bernard with a three-year extension. Gio is a player to target in PPR formats, especially once the departures of Marvin Jones and Mohamed Sanu are factored in, plus the Tyler Eifert injury.

Averaging 3.4 yards per carry and recording a total of five fumbles is a bad combination, and certainly not the first impression you want to make as a rookie. Even though Jones did exactly that last year, he remains slated take over as Washington's starting running back after Alfred Morris signed with Dallas as a free agent. Despite getting a number of opportunities last year, Jones was fairly quiet outside of a huge Week 2 and a 78-yard touchdown reception on a broken play against New Orleans in Week 10. The undrafted Rawls performed very well early in his rookie season when called upon due to Marshawn Lynch missing a total of nine games. Unfortunately, Rawls fractured his ankle in Week 14 while also tearing ligaments. There's a general belief that Rawls will miss the entire preseason, yet the team is telling the media he'll be available for Week 1. However, Seattle drafted C.J. Prosise in the third round and Alex Collins in the fifth. They also brought back workout warrior and second-round bust Christine Michael on a one-year deal. All the new depth at the position could be interpreted as the front office's lack of confidence in Rawls. Prosise is easily the most dynamic athlete of this group and could end up becoming the one that's leaned upon should Rawls be slow in his recovery. Prosise is also the better fit should Seattle opt to play in the more up-tempo style that was so successful for them in the second half of 2015.

The big holes that Gordon ran through at Wisconsin created an impressive-looking highlight reel and a monster junior season in 2014 that caused San Diego to trade up in order to draft him 15th overall. Now playing behind a terrible offensive line, Gordon couldn't find the end zone and averaged a paltry 3.5 yards per carry. As was also the case in college, Gordon did very little as a receiver. That's Danny Woodhead's, who's also vastly superior to Gordon in the red zone. If all that wasn't bad enough, Gordon is coming off micro-fracture surgery on his knee this offseason. That probably won't cost him any regular season games, but Gordon could really use all the reps he'll be missing during his rehab.

Matt Forte's sprained MCL allowed Chicago to use the second half of 2015 as a sneak preview of seeing Langford as their featured back. Even though he scored a total of six touchdowns in as many games, Langford averaged only 3.6 yards per carry. That's pretty bad, but by no means a death knell. Consider Forte had the same poor figure in his second year. Langford will have competition in the form of Ka'Deem Carey and rookie Jordan Howard. The trio is a collection of fourth- and fifth-round picks over the last three years. Chicago isn't totally committed to any of these guys which only serves to lay the groundwork for what could devolve into an ugly committee approach.

Jennings is 31 years old and coming off a career-high 195 carries while averaging a respectable 4.4 yards per carry. Oddly enough, Jennings never saw more than 13 carries in a game until averaging nearly 20 a game over the last four games of 2015. During that closing four-game stretch Jennings averaged 108 yards per game and scored two of his three touchdowns. Leading into 2016, it is shaping up to be another ugly-looking backfield for the Giants with Jennings likely the winner by default.

The first rule of drafting in a PPR league this season is to bump Riddick up your board. Last year, he saw 99 targets -- second only to Danny Woodhead at the running back position. The midseason switch to offensive coordinator Jim Bob Cooter was a huge boost to the Detroit offense, although Riddick's targets per game remained pretty similar. The offseason has provided some talk of Riddick getting more carries. That experiment may not last long, however. In three seasons, Riddick has only averaged 2.9 yards per carry on 72 attempts with a career-long of just 16 yards.

Not only does Forsett turn 31 years old in October, but Baltimore just drafted a very well-rounded running back in Kenneth Dixon out of Louisiana Tech in the fourth round. Prior to breaking his arm in Week 11, Forsett's production last year was pretty bad except for two big rushing games in Weeks 4 and 5. As a pass catcher, Forsett is among the worst backs of all-time based on yards per reception. Investing in Marc Trestman's running back is a wise move, figuring out exactly which one deserves your draft capital will be is the tricky part.

Abdullah is a big factor in the return game and is capable of breaking off the occasional run. Whether or not he can withstand a heavy workload remains to be seen. Putting the ball on the ground was an issue for Abdullah in college and continues to haunt him in the pros as he ended up with five fumbles on the year. As a rookie he played in all 16 games but averaged fewer than nine carries per game and needed off-season shoulder surgery. His primary competition for touches is Theo Riddick, who's an excellent receiver. Joique Bell was second to Abdullah in carries last year and looked terrible. Zach Zenner and Stevan Ridley will do battle for those big back carries. Simply put, this backfield is a hot mess.

Atlanta's third-round pick of 2015 got his career off to a nice start with 20 carries for 80 yards against Philadelphia in Week 1. A concussion would soon sideline him and open the door for second-year back Devonta Freeman to catch fire through the month of October. Coleman was seldom used the rest of the season, aside from a Week 12 start due to Freeman's own concussion. Coleman responded with 110 yards on 18 carries. For all the great numbers Freeman put up early in the year, he only averaged 4.0 yards per carry by the end. If Freeman ends up being a disappointing one-hit wonder, Coleman will get a chance to take this job back in 2016.

Yeldon was alright as a rookie, he just didn't show anything that was special. He averaged 4.1 yards per carry and only ran in two touchdowns all year. The issue for the prospective fantasy owner is his lack of involvement in the red zone. Yeldon's 22 carries inside the 20-yard line were only two more than New Orleans gave to Tim Hightower in far fewer games. Yeldon was banged up much of the season, and while incoming free agent Chris Ivory is far from being dent-proof himself, the pair will form a committee of some sort to begin the season. At the very least, Yeldon will be used in passing situations since Ivory has offered very little proficiency in that area of the game.

Sims takes a lot of the third down and passing situation duties away from Doug Martin. Last year, Sims' four receiving touchdowns matched tight end Austin Seferian-Jenkins, who only played in seven games, for the team lead. As a runner, Sims got 107 carries and averaged nearly five yards per carry. Martin missed a lot of games in 2013 and 2014, so the PPR owner that targets Sims for his pass-catching opportunities could end up with a starter should that injury bug strike Martin once again.

In his sixth pro season at age 27, Ivory surpassed 1,000 rushing yards for the first time in 2015. The stats show he only missed one game, but Ivory appeared on nine weekly injury reports with five different issues. Those various ailments appeared to take their toll. Ivory began the season averaging 5.5 yards per carry while scoring four touchdowns in the first four games. Yet Ivory only managed 3.7 yards per carry in his final 11 contests, scoring only once in the last eight. Jacksonville brought Ivory in to pair with second-year back T.J. Even though he was targeted a career-high 81 times last year, Vereen's usage was very inconsistent and, frankly, disappointing during his first year with the Giants. In fact, he lost 83 yards from scrimmage when compared to his 2014 season with New England. His pass-catching abilities were vastly underutilized by then offensive coordinator, now head coach, Ben McAdoo. Vereen wasn't able to catch more than two balls in half the games. Veteran Rashad Jennings is 31 years old and a decent player when he's healthy. However, Vereen is easily the most dynamic option in the backfield and could be a PPR staple if he becomes the steady No. 3 option in a good passing offense.

Powell has been an effective contributor to the Jets' passing game in recent years. He'll be backing up Matt Forte, who turns 31 in December and had knee issues last year. Even if Forte struggles to run the ball, Powell is at his best catching passes. Put him on the short list of backs that get an extra kick in PPR scoring.

41) Kenneth DIXON — BAL

EXP. ROOKIE YEAR AGE: 22 HT: 5-10 WT: 215 BYE: 8

Dixon is a very intriguing rookie that should compete with the aging Justin Forsett and second-year Buck Allen right away. In his four years at Louisiana Tech, Dixon got it done both rushing and receiving, exceeding 1,000 yards from scrimmage each season. He also found the end zone 26 or more times in three different years. The Marc Trestman offense is extremely friendly to running backs, especially ones who can catch like Dixon. Any instability in the Baltimore backfield creates an excellent opportunity for the Ravens' fourth-round selection to steal this job.

42) Derrick HENRY — TEN

EXP. ROOKIE YEAR AGE: 21 HT: 6-2 WT: 242 BYE: 13

Despite trading with Philadelphia to get DeMarco Murray, Tennessee also invested a second-round pick in Henry. Even though Murray will have the edge as a receiver, Henry could bulldoze past him on the depth chart at some point. In his junior year at Alabama, Henry rumbled his way to 2,219 yards and 28 touchdowns en route to collecting the Heisman Trophy. The Titans are coming off a season in which they saw their franchise quarterback, Marcus Mariota, sprain his knee twice and miss a total of four games. The duo of Murray and Henry should get plenty of opportunities to help their QB carry this offense, so long as the defense can keep things close.

Williams scored a touchdown in each of his first six games, although there were games missed due to a concussion sandwiched in between. Later in the year there was the occasional game in which Williams and LeSean McCoy both produced. However, those types of games are not typical. McCoy did miss some time last year, so it's not out of the question for Williams to see a couple of starts if the injury bug bites McCoy once again. Drafting the handcuff to your primary running back is a strategy that can vary based on league size. Expect the pairing of Williams with McCoy to be among the most popular.

Williams will go down as one of the most successful running back handcuffs in the history of fantasy football after his 2015 season. He filled in brilliantly during Le'Veon Bell's two-game suspension to start the year and then did it again after Bell went down in Week 8. From Weeks 9-15, Williams had three multi-touchdown games and scored eight total touchdowns in that span. A foot injury in the season finale kept him out of the playoffs but didn't require surgery. Williams is one of the few handcuffs worth taking in standard leagues.

While the New England backfield is notoriously difficult to predict on a week-to-week basis, they generally want to run Blount 15-plus times a game and throw it to Dion Lewis. Even in games when the Patriots are playing more up-tempo, a lopsided score can get them back to grinding the clock in the fourth quarter to protect a lead. Despite season-ending injuries suffered by both Blount and Lewis, New England did not make any moves at running back during the offseason.

The new front office and coaching staff in Cleveland seem pleased with the running backs they have inherited. Crowell should handle the early downs while Duke Johnson will step in to catch passes. When compared to his rookie season, Crowell took a slight step back in 2015. Although, Week 14 saw him destroy a hapless San Francisco defense with 145 yards and two touchdowns on 20 carries. Between lopsided scores and curious coaching decisions we've yet to see exactly what Crowell can really do. Hopefully, new head coach Hue Jackson provides a lot more clarity to this backfield.

If you are into the handcuff strategy and own Adrian Peterson then McKinnon has some value. Otherwise, he's not much of a consideration in a standard league. Even though the Vikings take Peterson out in passing situations and on long third downs, the passing offense lacks volume and explosiveness, and on typical weeks McKinnon won't see enough opportunities to help fantasy squads.

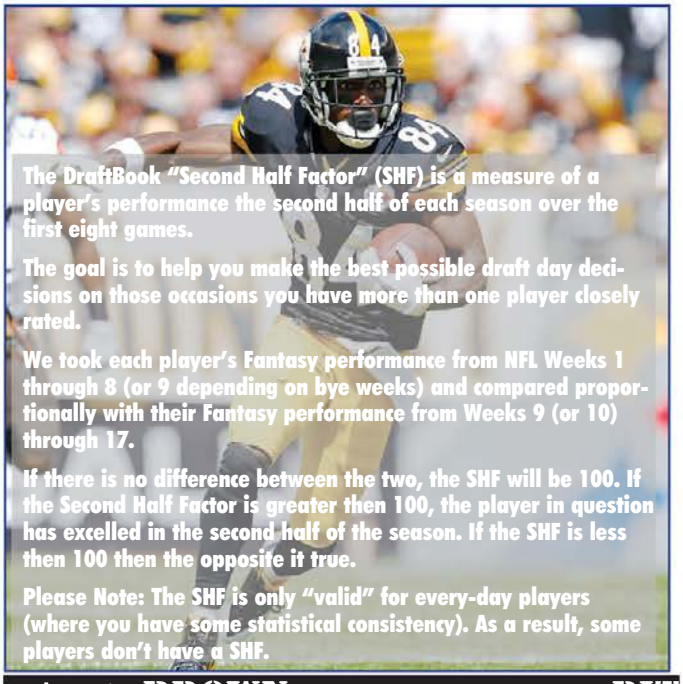
Prosise was taken in the third round by a Seattle team that lost Marshawn Lynch to retirement and is hoping Thomas Rawls' broken ankle and ligament damage will all be mended in time to start Week 1. Even if Rawls is somehow 100 percent, he's not much of a pass catcher. Prosise will immediately step in as the third-down back and is the best option in passing situations. He played wide receiver at the start of his college career and is likely to be lining up all throughout the formation. If Rawls is limited, or Seattle simply opts to pass the ball more frequently, which was successful in the second half of 2015, Prosise's versatility could prove to be a game changer for both the Seahawks and his fantasy owners.

50) Devontae BOOKER — DEN

EXP. ROOKIE YEAR AGE: 24 HT: 5-11 WT: 212 BYE: 11

Booker is a fourth-round pick out of Utah that has been recovering quickly from a torn meniscus. Denver likes, but doesn't totally love, C.J. Anderson, who they attempted to low-ball as a restricted free agent before matching a multi-year offer sheet from Miami. They also re-signed Ronnie Hillman to a cheap, one-year deal. Booker is unlikely to win the starting job but could be a factor in the second half of the season.



The DraftBook "Second Half Factor" (SHF) is a measure of a player's performance the second half of each season over the first eight games.

The goal is to help you make the best possible draft day decisions on those occasions you have more than one player closely rated.

We took each player's Fantasy performance from NFL Weeks 1 through 8 (or 9 depending on bye weeks) and compared proportionally with their Fantasy performance from Weeks 9 (or 10) through 17.

If there is no difference between the two, the SHF will be 100. If the Second Half Factor is greater then 100, the player in question has excelled in the second half of the season. If the SHF is less then 100 then the opposite it true.

Please Note: The SHF is only "valid" for every-day players (where you have some statistical consistency). As a result, some players don't have a SHF.

It shouldn't take much to convince you that Brown is the No. 1 wide receiver in fantasy football, perhaps No. 1 across all positions. For starters, Brown has led the league in both receptions and receiving yards the last two years. In 2015 he saw a slight reduction in touchdowns (down to 10) but posted more receiving yards despite losing quarterback Ben Roethlisberger for multiple games. Over the last two years, Brown is averaging 110 receiving yards per game while scoring 23 touchdowns in 32 contests. Targets clearly won't be an issue for Brown, and Martavis Bryant's season-long suspension could possibly push him over 200 targets for the first time.

If someone stepped up to challenge Brown for fantasy's top spot it would be Beckham. Last year, OBJ never saw fewer than six targets in a game. On 11 occasions he was thrown at nine or more times. There was a six-game span in the second half of the season in which Beckham scored eight touchdowns and averaged more than 130 yards per game. The Giants selected Oklahoma product Sterling Shepard in the second round of April's draft to provide another legitimate option for opposing defenses to worry about. Anything he can contribute should help reduce the amount of double coverage Beckham draws on a weekly basis. And that is a good thing for OBJ's owners in 2016.

Last year, Jones led the league with 136 receptions and 1,871 yards. Yet his eight touchdowns left his owners slightly disappointed, especially considering Jones had posted four of them over the Falcons' first three games. QB Matt Ryan has never taken that next step toward greatness and his struggles were never more evident than 2015. Mohamed Sanu was signed as a free agent this spring to replace the ineffective Roddy White. Clearly Atlanta believes that Sanu is ready to become a No. 2 option. Atlanta also drafted tight end Austin Hooper out of Stanford in the third and UCLA's Devin Fuller in the seventh. If nothing else, this receiving corps has a lot more speed and athleticism than it has in years past.

Following a season in which Houston had four quarterbacks each attempt more than 40 passes they went out and signed Brock Osweiler away from Denver. Despite dealing with such a challenging carousel at the game's most important position, Hopkins still managed 111 catches for more than 1,500 yards. Thanks to the quarterback shuffle, Hopkins could only manage a catch rate of 57.8 percent, the lowest among all wide receivers that caught more than 80 balls. The upgrades on offense didn't end with Osweiler. Running back Lamar Miller also came over in free agency and the team drafted receivers Will Fuller from Notre Dame in the first and Braxton Miller from Ohio State in the third. Combined with Jaelen Strong, a third rounder from last year's draft, this young wide receiver corps suddenly has a lot of potential. Hopkins remains the headliner, and still has some room before hitting his fantasy ceiling.

Bryant came into last year having averaged more than 1,300 receiving yards and nearly 14 touchdowns per season from 2012-14. Although Dez was banged up on numerous occasions, he never missed a game during that three-season span. However, after missing time during training camp with a hamstring strain he suffered a fractured foot in last year's season opener. He returned in Week 8 but was generally ineffective through eight games until team doctors determined that another surgery was required on his foot. Heading into 2016, Dallas is looking to get back to the run first, run often formula after drafting Ezekiel Elliott with the fourth overall pick. Given that shift in offensive philosophy, fantasy success for Dez will require him staying healthy, Romo staying healthy, and the pair to be extremely efficient when they do decide put the ball in the air.

The offense in Cincinnati is undergoing a bunch of changes at wide receiver. Marvin Jones signed with Detroit. Mohamed Sanu signed with Atlanta. In their places Tyler Boyd from Pitt was taken in the second round of this year's draft and Brandon LaFell was signed as a free agent. Tight end Tyler Eifert, who missed nearly all of 2014 and several games last year, won't be ready for the start of the season after undergoing ankle surgery following an injury suffered in the Pro Bowl. All of this upheaval could result in Green catching 100 passes for the first time. Although he's come extremely close to breaking that threshold in the past, Green did score double-digit touchdowns in all three seasons in which he's played all 16 games. While Cincinnati is never among the flashier offenses, there is no denying that Green compares favorably to any receiver in the game.

Balky hamstrings have put Jeffery on the injury report 11 times over the last two seasons. Last year he played a career-low nine games and also dealt with issues to his groin and calf. When Jeffery is healthy he's extremely productive. In 2015 he averaged a career-best 89.7 yards per game and was targeted nine or more times on seven different occasions. This offseason Chicago lost offensive coordinator Adam Gase to Miami, running back Matt Forte to the Jets and traded tight end Martellus Bennett to New England. On the plus side, Kevin White appears ready to go after a lost rookie season and Zach Miller played well when Bennett was hurt. If you are willing to deal with the headaches caused by head coach John Fox suppressing injury updates, Jeffery could prove to be worth the risk.

8) Mike EVANS — TB

There are several reasons why Evans may not be getting the respect he deserves inside fantasy circles. He went from a dozen touchdowns as a rookie down to just three last season. Evans also had a number of key drops. Both of those issues, however, are subject to variance and are simply noise. Keep in mind, last season Evans added 26 targets, six receptions, and 155 yards to his rookie line. While the catch rate was less efficient, he was playing with a rookie quarterback in Jameis Winston, who will continue to improve. Evans' supporting cast also demands he sees somewhere in the neighborhood of 150 targets. Vincent Jackson is 33 years old and missed half a dozen games last year. Meanwhile, Austin Seferian-Jenkins has already missed 16 games just two years into his career

It's hard to imagine Robinson improving upon 1,400 receiving yards and 14 touchdowns. However, he's still a strong WR1 on draft day even after you factor in the likely regression. Last year, the Jacksonville passing offense was very productive thanks to frequently playing from behind. They were also forced to throw in the red zone due to mediocre play from running back T. J. Yeldon. Free agent signee Chris Ivory should improve the red zone rushing attack, and the Jags have invested heavily on the defensive side of the ball. Even with less garbage time, Robinson is extremely talented and will put up big numbers in 2016.

A slow 40-yard dash time dropped Allen into the third round of the 2013 draft. He quickly altered peoples' perceptions, finishing his rookie campaign with 71 catches, 1,046 yards, and eight touchdowns. Unfortunately, Allen's dreadful follow-up in 2014 installed a new set of concerns. Those were put to rest in Week 1 last season, as Allen opened the year with 15 catches and 166 yards. He posted several additional big games until suffering a kidney laceration which ended his season in Week 8. The injury shouldn't affect his outlook for 2016 and didn't stop San Diego from extending Allen's contract. While more possession receiver than dynamic playmaker, Allen is extremely good at what he does and should enjoy a healthy amount of volume this season.

It's fair to say there were some peaks and valleys in Cooper's rookie year. Over the final seven games, he recorded his fourth and fifth 100-yard games of the season but was also held to 20 or fewer yards on four occasions. In total, Cooper didn't surpass 50 receiving yards in half of his games, yet still crossed the 1,000-yard plateau for the season. Perhaps Michael Crabtree is closer to being the team's top receiver than we thought. After all, Crabtree saw 16 more targets, caught 13 more passes, and scored three more touchdowns than his rookie counterpart. That said, Cooper just needs to avoid those clunker games to out produce Crabtree in Year 2, perhaps by a wide margin.

Despite suffering a broken foot in the offseason, Buffalo is hopeful that Watkins will be available for Week 1. This is the same injury that Dez Bryant had last year; he returned too early, played poorly, and needed another surgery. Last year, Watkins got off to a slow start and was vocal about the lack of opportunities. Once Buffalo started utilizing the second-year wideout, good things began to happen. On six occasions he saw eight or more targets. In those games he scored a total of seven touchdowns and averaged nearly 120 yards per game. Buffalo appears to be limiting Tyrod Taylor, but when they do take chances, they are often down the field aimed at Watkins. There is risk here: Staying healthy was a challenge for Watkins last year and he's already got one strike against him coming into 2016.

After a career year with 1,500 yards and 14 touchdowns, the 32-year-old Marshall might be a hard guy to fully invest in. Thankfully, he's not being priced as a WR1. The consistency during his elite 2015 was simply unreal. Marshall never saw fewer than seven targets in a game. There were only four games in which he did not score, yet Marshall still averaged six catches for more than 94 yards in those contests. Simply put, there wasn't a single week in which Marshall's owners didn't have a chance to win thanks to his production. Unfortunately, the Ryan Fitzpatrick contract situation is troubling. While he wasn't as good as his numbers indicate, the Jets don't have another quarterback on the roster who is going to perform better than Fitzpatrick.

Nelson is 31 years old and coming off an ACL injury he suffered last preseason. Thankfully, missing the entire season also meant a lot of recovery time for Aaron Rodger's go-to guy. Nelson's 2014 was a career season with 151 targets, 98 receptions, 1,519 yards, and 13 touchdowns. He also has a 15-TD season on his resume from back in 2011. Once upon a time, fantasy owners debated whether Nelson or Randall Cobb was the Packers' WR to own. Cobb's failure to seize the No. 1 job last year leaves no doubt as to which Green Bay receiver fantasy owners should prefer, at least for this season.

While the thought of Mark Sanchez starting at quarterback in Denver strikes fear into Thomas' potential owners, the lackluster combo of Peyton Manning and Brock Osweiler nearly elevated him into the top 10 among fantasy wide receivers last season. In fact, if not for some ugly performances (that were self-inflicted) down the stretch, Thomas probably would have notched another top-10 campaign. Denver's playoff run was even worse for Thomas. He was targeted 21 times over three games, only caught seven balls for 60 yards, and did not score a touchdown. Outside of Emmanuel Sanders this team doesn't have much else at receiver, so despite the disappointing close to 2015 Thomas can't be downgraded too far.

Cooks entered 2015 with a lot of hype across the fantasy industry. Frankly, things weren't looking very good six games into the season. Cooks had scored just once and had yet to see double-digit targets in a game. There were just two games in which he surpassed 63 yards. Cooks proceeded to ignite the box scores over the next nine games, scoring eight touchdowns and averaging nearly 85 yards a game. After Marques Colston finally hung up his cleats, there is no question that Cooks will dominate the targets in New Orleans in his third season.

Not having Andrew Luck on the field for the bulk of 2015 was a big problem for everyone on the Indianapolis offense, especially Hilton. His catch rate dropped from 62.6 percent in 2014 down to 51.5 last year, easily a career worst. However, Hilton was still able to exceed 1,100 yards while putting together the occasional big game. Indy is wisely moving on from the failed Andre Johnson experiment. Instead, they'll deploy three burners in Hilton, Donte Moncrief and Phillip Dorsett. After a one-year detour, this is an offense that should bounce back toward the top of the league.

Even though Benjamin barely caught 50 percent of his targets as a rookie in 2014, he scored nine touchdowns and inched across the 1,000 receiving yards mark. Unfortunately, a torn ACL the following summer cost Benjamin his entire 2015 sophomore campaign. In his absence Carolina pieced it together at wide receiver with the likes of Corey Brown and Ted Ginn until Devin Funchess began to produce in the second half of the year. Benjamin should be good to go during training camp given all the time he's had to recover, but Funchess will cost far less on draft day and has arguably similar upside.

Perhaps no other wide receiver is more impacted by points per reception scoring versus traditional scoring than Landry. In 32 career games he has been targeted six or more times on 24 occasions. Landry has grabbed six or more balls 18 times. While incoming head coach Adam Gase provides a lot of optimism for the future of this offense, the group of wide receivers is suddenly a crowded bunch. DeVante Parker came on strong at the end of his rookie season last year. Kenny Stills is someone Miami liked enough to acquire via trade last offseason and Rutgers' Leonte Carroo was drafted in the third round this April. Landry is good at what he does in the slot, but the improving talent around him may cap his ceiling close to last year's totals.

After a broken foot cost Edelman the final seven games of the regular season he returned for the playoffs and posted 10 catches and 100 yards against Kansas City. By the end of the AFC title game the following week against Denver, Edelman was limping around again. At the time New England claimed a second surgery would not be needed. That turned out to be false and Edelman indeed underwent another operation this May. Tom Brady is likely to be suspended for the first four games, but at least we know he'll play in 2016. What we don't know is if Edelman's foot will be fully healed before the start of his age-30 season. And injuries are very much a concern here. In seven pro seasons, Edelman has only played all 16 games once.

Prior to suffering a high ankle sprain that ruined his ability to produce in the playoffs, Maclin saw his regular season stats saved by a stretch-run scoring frenzy. Over the Chiefs' final six games he scored six touchdowns and hauled in enough passes to finish with over 1,000 yards for a second consecutive season. Playing for Kansas City, and more specifically with Alex Smith under center, it's fair to question Maclin's ceiling even though it's really just Maclin and tight end Travis Kelce competing for downfield targets. If you don't mind a high-floor WR2 with limited upside, Maclin fits the bill.

The retirement of Calvin Johnson makes Tate one of the most intriguing players in fantasy football because he now steps into the No. 1 role in Detroit. Back in 2014, Tate had a pair of 150-yard games when Johnson was sidelined. Obviously that sample is far too small to draw much of a conclusions from, and we already know Tate is a good player. He very rarely drops balls and is outstanding in the open field, breaking tackles and running after the catch like a running back. He will be 28 this season, but Tate experienced little wear and tear during his four years with Seattle. Free-agent signee Marvin Jones is more of a complementary piece than a featured target and should not affect Tate's rather lofty 2016 ceiling.

In his two seasons with Denver Sanders has gone over 1,400 and 1,100 yards. Mark Sanchez figures to begin the new season as the Broncos' starting quarterback and Demaryius Thomas is going to hog a lot of targets. However, the team hasn't really developed (or brought in) a third target at either wide receiver or tight end to challenge the Thomas and Sanders duo. So while the offense could prove to be somewhat limited, the majority of passing targets will find that pair of receivers. Sanders is sneaky-old, having turned 29 in March, but he'll have a few more productive seasons, starting in 2016.

For a player that was not selected by any team back in the 2011 draft, Baldwin has definitely made a name for himself. From Week 10 through Week 16 of last year he caught 42 passes for 678 yards and a dozen -- count 'em, 12 -- touchdowns. Keep in mind, Baldwin only scored twice in the previous eight games. In a span of four games midway through that scoring barrage, he caught 10 touchdowns on just 21 receptions. While extremely impressive, that type of ratio is unlikely to repeat itself. Even so, Baldwin, who was rewarded with a high-end contract extension in June, is the best pass catcher on this team. He and Russell Wilson have clearly developed a strong rapport, seemingly reading each other's mind when Wilson breaks the pocket to scramble. Despite all their late-season success throwing the ball last year, Seattle coaches have stated their desire to lean heavily on the power run game once again in 2016 lowering Baldwin's odds of notching another 1,000-yard season.

After Jordy Nelson went down with a season-ending knee injury last preseason, it was presumed that Cobb would be capable (and successful) as the team's leading receiver. However, he actually took a big step backward from 1,287 yards and 12 touchdowns in 2014 to 829 yards and six touchdowns. That's a decline in average yards per game of nearly 30 yards. Looking forward, Nelson is back and Cobb is still only 25 yards old, so there's hope for a rebound season. Green Bay has some other wideouts in the mix but none of the bunch will challenge the primary duo of Nelson and Cobb for opportunities.

After being taken in the first round of last year's NFL draft, foot issues cost Parker sizable chunks of his rookie season. However, he still managed to make his mark in the last six games of 2015. During that stretch he averaged nearly 75 yards per game and scored three touchdowns. Parker really finished the season on a strong note, tallying more than 95 yards per game over the Dolphins' final three tilts. Adam Gase is now the head coach, which could prove to be a great benefit to the offense. Jarvis Landry will get his share of the targets, but Parker is the playmaker they sorely need.

Decker is the greatest fantasy wide receiver that no one ever seems to get excited about. Since 2012, Decker is tied for third among all receivers with 41 touchdowns. He's also eighth in receptions and ninth in yards. In three of those seasons he's exceeded 1,000 yards and scored 11 or more times. Last year, he caught 12 touchdowns in 12 separate games and averaged six receptions for more than 90 yards his other three games. The entire Jets' passing game was ridiculously efficient in 2015. While he'll never be confused for a Pro Bowl-level quarterback, Ryan Fitzpatrick is having a tough time coming to an agreement with Gang Green on a new contract. Decker could come at even more of an incredible value due to fears of Geno Smith being named as the team's starter.

A broken finger suffered in the preseason didn't cost Floyd any games last year but it did limit his snap counts in the early going. That opened the door for John Brown to contribute significantly. Once Floyd was fully healthy, the coaching staff struck a workable balance and were able to use their two deep threats with a lot of success. Starting with his first touchdown in Week 6, Floyd either scored, or produced 100 receiving yards, in seven of his final 10 regular season games. Larry Fitzgerald experienced a fantastic bounce-back season and led the team in all receiving categories. However, he was significantly less productive over the final six games and is turning 33 years old. This could be the season in which the torch is finally passed to Floyd.

It was a challenging sophomore season for Moncrief, but one that featured five touchdowns in the first seven games. All in all, he finished with six TDs while catching 61 percent of his targets for over 700 yards. Even though the Colts released Andre Johnson in the offseason, second-year man Phillip Dorsett will see an increase in targets as the No. 3 option for Indianapolis. Thankfully, a healthy Andrew Luck is more than capable of making all three wideouts viable fantasy options. According to the Indianapolis Star, Moncrief has grown close with the talented T.Y. Hilton, texting him for advice and instruction. Of some concern? Moncrief did not participate in the team's initial OTAs as he was wearing a boot on his left foot after undergoing toe surgery in the offseason. His return from the injury will be something to monitor this summer, but he should be fully healed by Week 1.

Matthews is at his best playing as a slot receiver, plain and simple. Previous attempts to move him outside have not worked well. Thankfully, new head coach Doug Pederson has already noticed and commented about this fact during OTAs. The problem, however, is how often Pederson and offensive coordinator Frank Reich are going to deploy a slot receiver in their offense. Having said that, the likes of fellow Eagles receivers Rueben Randle, Nelson Agholor, Josh Huff, and Chris Givens aren't going to intimidate many opposing defenders. Matthews' production has been inconsistent during his two years in the league, another uneven season appears likely.

Nearing age 33, this could be it for Fitzgerald. Or not. After all, last year he put together one of his better seasons in recent memory playing as the Cardinals' slot receiver. Fitz did appear to be slowing down over the final four games of the regular season, however, when he averaged 4.5 catches and 42 yards per game. After resting during Wild Card week (thanks to Arizona's division title) he promptly exploded for 176 yards and a touchdown on eight catches in Arizona's first playoff game against Green Bay. Fitzgerald does play with two of the better deep threats in the game so consistent production may be harder to come by when both are healthy. Proceed with caution.

Simple name, uncommon speed. That's John Brown. After flashing at times during his rookie season, he took full advantage of the additional snaps that came his way in 2015 while Michael Floyd made a slow return from three broken fingers. Brown himself was slowed by a mid-season hamstring injury but quickly returned to form. Four of his seven touchdowns, and three of his biggest yardage outputs, came in the final seven games. Having Floyd at full strength for an entire season could keep Brown from improving upon last year's numbers. Of course, any backsliding from a soon-to-be 33-year-old Larry Fitzgerald could also open the door for Brown to blow them out of the water.

As an undrafted rookie free agent Hurns was a Week 1 wonder in 2014, but was extremely uneven the rest of his first NFL season. While not always heavily targeted, consistency was much easier to find in Year 2. For starters, Hurns had a stretch in which he caught a touchdown in seven consecutive games. He also scored in all five games in which he exceeded 100 yards. The questions surrounding Jacksonville entering this season revolve around how often they will be playing from behind and how they operate inside the red zone. Last year it was a lot of garbage time and plenty of passes inside the 20 because of a mediocre running attack. This season should see a much-improved defense and a goal-line bulldozer in Chris Ivory, both of which could make it tough for Hurns to repeat his 2015 success.

Chicago desperately needs a No. 2 target to complement Alshon Jeffery. Heck, given his injury history they would probably be happy with anyone capable of producing at an above average level should he miss games again in 2016. Of course, health is no sure thing with White either. After being taken with the seventh overall pick in last year's draft, White never saw the field due to a stress fracture in his shin. Early reports have been very positive surrounding his current status, but there's work to be done before we elevate him to No. 2 status. White is already 24 years old because of his stint in junior college. At West Virginia he played in a spread offense and only had one productive season in his two years on campus. He's talented, but expect growing pains.

Ideally, Tennessee would like to see Green-Beckham and the newly-signed Rishard Matthews be the primary outside receivers and Kendall Wright playing out of the slot, where he's a better fit. However, production last year was extremely erratic during DGB's rookie campaign. Regardless, any of the Titans' wide receivers will likely trail Delanie Walker in targets again this season. The team is also looking to run the ball more frequently, adding DeMarco Murray and rookie Derrick Henry this offseason. That said, perhaps no one on this roster outside of Marcus Mariota has the kind of upside Green-Beckham possesses. How well that connection between the second-year players develops will go a long way toward Green-Beckham's ultimate fantasy value.

36) Corey COLEMAN — CLE

After two big seasons at Baylor, Coleman was on NFL-draftniks' short list of players ready to step into the league in 2016. The same crowd praised Cleveland's front office for deftly moving down in the draft and still landing Coleman with the 15th overall pick. He suffered from poor conditioning in rookie camp but took HC Hue Jackson's comments to heart and promised he'd be ready when training camp opened... Coleman doesn't have the biggest catch radius but makes up for it with speed and athleticism. More importantly for fantasy purposes, Coleman will produce immediately. The only concern is how limited he might be given the Browns' supporting cast around him.

As a rookie last year, Lockett made an immediate impact in the Seahawks' return game. By midseason he was making his presence felt on offense as well. Leading up to the regular season finale, Lockett was targeted seven times in each of four consecutive games. Seattle opted to retain Jermaine Kearse in the offseason, but we've seen Kearse's ceiling, and it isn't very high... Lockett, on the other hand, is an up-and-coming, multi-faceted weapon that's only going to get better in Year 2.

Limited early in his career by bad quarterback play and a foot injury, Crabtree finally got things rolling as he posted 1,105 yards and nine touchdowns for the 49ers in 2012. Unfortunately, he suffered a torn Achilles the following preseason. Crabtree experienced an understandably slow recovery that carried over into the 2014 season -- his challenges magnified thanks to the team's struggling passing attack. Switching to the other side of the San Francisco Bay proved to be a great call. While he never caught more than nine passes in a game, Crabtree exceeded 100 yards three times in his first season in Oakland. He also scored four of his nine touchdowns in those games. The expected growth of second-year wideout Amari Cooper will keep Crabtree as Oakland's No. 2 man, and 2015 was likely his ceiling.

It's been an interesting path for Snead, an undrafted rookie from 2014. He was signed by Cleveland and made it all the way through the preseason until the final round of cuts. Snead would then split the rest of 2014 on the practice squads in Carolina and New Orleans. The Saints gave him a spot on the 53-man roster last year and immediately reaped the rewards. Snead was one of three players that Drew Brees targeted more than 100 times and finished second on the team with 984 receiving yards. Although their roles are all different, Snead will likely be competing with incoming tight end Coby Fleener and second-round pick Michael Thomas, a tall rookie wide receiver, for the secondary target opportunities behind Brandin Cooks in the Big Easy.

Despite a glaring need, San Francisco appears afraid to draft wide receivers early. They've also been reluctant to spend on a marquee free agent, despite having plenty of cap space. Therefore it wasn't a complete surprise when they elected to give Smith a five-year, $40 million deal despite an incomplete set of skills that limit his effectiveness to deep passing routes. Regardless of who wins the starting quarterback job for the 49ers, new HC Chip Kelly's passing offense is based on quick timing routes, not heaving bombs downfield. Even though Smith seems like an odd fit for the scheme, there's really no one else in the receiving corps to steal targets. The Niners also figure to be trailing the majority of the time and so Smith may end up being a garbage time star.

41) Laquon TREADWELL — MIN

Prior to the Combine, Treadwell was widely considered to be the best option at his position. However, the lackluster workout numbers knocked him down a few spots. Minnesota was more than happy to take him 23rd overall, however. Treadwell's mid-range game is a good fit for Teddy Bridgewater, who lacks an explosive arm. Last year we saw Stefon Diggs get hot early only to fade away after four games. While the improving depth at receiver is a welcome sight for the Vikings, running the ball with Adrian Peterson and playing stout defense are the cornerstones around which this team is built.

Martavis Bryant's season-long suspension has elevated Wheaton into the No. 2 spot in Pittsburgh. Of course, Bryant was suspended for four games last year and missed a fifth due to a knee injury. During those five games, Wheaton only averaged 3.6 targets, 1.8 receptions, and 45.6 yards per game. He looked better down the stretch though, scoring four touchdowns in the final six games, highlighted by 13 targets, nine catches, and 200 yards against Seattle in Week 12. Oddly enough, the only other double-digit target game from Wheaton came three weeks later against another premier defense in Denver. Should Wheaton falter as 2016 opens, second-year man Sammie Coates and/or veteran Darrius Heyward-Bey will be thrown into the mix with very little hesitation.

Despite catching just 36 balls for 450 yards last season, Hogan -- known as "7-Eleven" because, in theory, he's always open -- impressed HC Bill Belichick with his football IQ during a visit and the Patriots made an offer the Bills wouldn't match. Remember, at 6-1 and 220 pounds, Hogan is bigger than both Danny Amendola and Julian Edelman. The trio would give quarterback Tom Brady a reliable collection of receivers to pair along with game-changing TE Rob Gronkowski. Assuming Hogan opens the season as the starter opposite Edelman (Brandon LaFell's release opened that spot), Hogan will be in the best position of his career. Playing with Brady alone (for at least 12 games this season) should provide a big boost in production. He could be one of those under the radar players who provide great value.

Jones is a quality player that's going to provide solid value to his real life team and in fantasy. He's going to run good routes, make plays, and move the chains. The retirement of Calvin Johnson has Detroit pressing the reset button in how they approach the passing game, and where Jones ultimately fits in their plans. Golden Tate played well in the few games in which Megatron was out of commission. Meanwhile, tight end Eric Ebron is getting better and deserves more targets. Jones could fall anywhere along the spectrum depending on the team's game plan for that week. Still, he should be a high-floor play as a WR3 or flex, depending on the league.

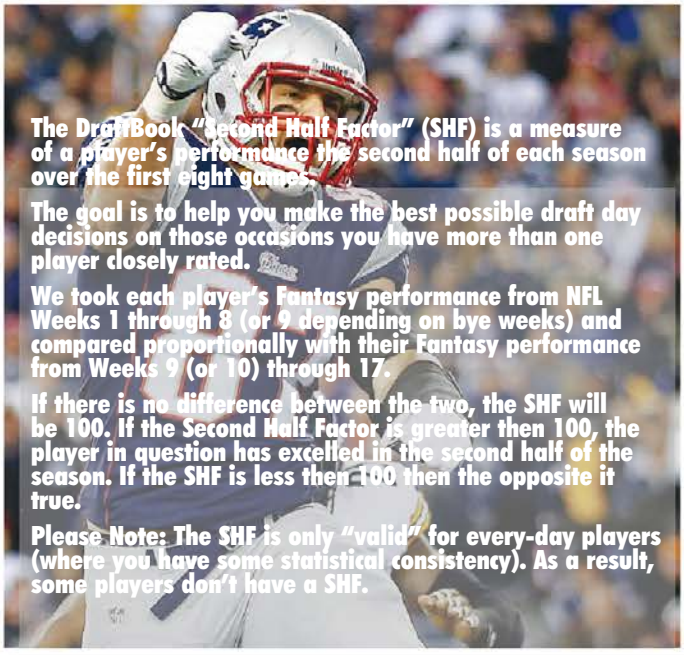
The Panthers liked Funchess so much coming out of Michigan that they traded up in the second round to get him as other players with first-round grades flew off the NFL draft board. After being moved from tight end to receiver (and back) in college, Funchess got off to a slow start last season. He struggled with dropped passes through the first half of the season but learned to calm down, trust his hands more and better use his large frame against smaller defensive backs. The result was 31 catches for 473 yards, the fifth-most ever for a Panthers' rookie receiver. And his five touchdowns tied for second in franchise history for a first-year receiver. Now the Panthers hope to see Funchess emerge in his second season. Consider him a low-priced speculative pick with possibly substantial upside.

47) Sterling SHEPARD — NYG

EXP. ROOKIE YEAR AGE: 22 HT: 5-10 WT: 193 BYE: 8

Any rookie wide receiver in 2016 could not have asked for a better landing spot than the one Shepard found in New York. In addition to playing with an above-average quarterback in Eli Manning, Odell Beckham Jr. is going to command a ridiculous amount of defensive attention on the opposite side. Even if Victor Cruz is finally able to get back on the field he'll play the slot, leaving Shepard on the outside in two-receiver sets. Former Giant Rueben Randle averaged over 108 targets per season in Ben McAdoo's offense -- expect Shepard to see a bunch as well.



The DraftBook "Second Half Factor" (SHF) is a measure of a player's performance the second half of each season over the first eight games.

The goal is to help you make the best possible draft day decisions on those occasions you have more than one player closely rated.

We took each player's Fantasy performance from NFL Weeks 1 through 8 (or 9 depending on bye weeks) and compared proportionally with their Fantasy performance from Weeks 9 (or 10) through 17.

If there is no difference between the two, the SHF will be 100. If the Second Half Factor is greater then 100, the player in question has excelled in the second half of the season. If the SHF is less then 100 then the opposite it true.

Please Note: The SHF is only "valid" for every-day players (where you have some statistical consistency). As a result, some players don't have a SHF.

Gronkowski is a beast at playing football, especially when it comes to scoring touchdowns. In 80 regular season games, he's scored a touchdown in 48 of them, more than half. In those 48 contests, Gronk scored multiple touchdowns 14 times. Which means Gronk has scored more than one touchdown in almost 20 percent of his regular season games. Last season, however, Gronk didn't have any multi-TD games after Week 1 until the playoffs. Speaking of the postseason, he's scored a touchdown in five consecutive playoff games. Health is the only concern with Gronk -- although he has only missed two games over the last two seasons, one of which was normal rest in a meaningless Week 17 tilt. Even with Tom Brady set to miss four games, expect continued stellar production for the best fantasy TE in the business.

A history of concussions had been the main thing holding Reed back from the breakout performance we finally saw last year. He started last season averaging 80 yards in the first three games but suffered a concussion in Week 4. Reed missed two games, but returned better than ever. Over the final 10 games, he scored multiple touchdowns four times and exceeded 80 yards in four of the last six weeks. In the playoff defeat to Green Bay, Reed caught nine balls for 120 yards and a touchdown. The aging receiver duo of DeSean Jackson and Pierre Garcon won't steal many targets from Reed. Meanwhile, the backfield lacks experience and didn't produce much last year. Washington took full advantage of a generous late-season schedule, but Reed's ability and potential are legit.

The 31-year-old Olsen is entering his fifth season with Carolina, and 10th overall as a pro. He's now exceeded 800 receiving yards in four straight years, averaging half a dozen touchdowns per season. The last two years have both seen Olsen surpass 120 targets and 1,000 yards. Given that very solid track record, Kelvin Benjamin's return doesn't alter the outlook for Olsen one bit. In fact, a more efficient passing offense helps all parties involved. Olsen was extremely consistent last year with 10 games of 65 receiving yards or more, highlighted by three of over 125 yards. Olsen can be fantasy's top-performing tight end on any given week but doesn't have the elite upside of Gronk or Reed.

The 31-year-old Walker has been one of the few bright spots in recent years for Tennessee, who signed him after spending seven years in San Francisco as a backup. In 15 regular season games played last season, Walker was targeted eight or more times in 10 contests. The Titans undoubtedly want to protect franchise QB Marcus Mariota as they attempt to build a legitimate roster around him. To that end, this offseason they traded for running back DeMarco Murray. Tennessee also spent early draft picks on the offensive line and added another running back, Heisman Trophy winner Derrick Henry. At receiver they'll likely push Dorial Green-Beckham to the top of the pecking order, in addition to signing a respectable wideout in Rishard Matthews. Despite all that, Walker still should be their most dependable weapon this season.

There's so much potential in Kelce, a promising tight end and now a reality television star. If only he played in a more aggressive offense. Last season's totals look pretty similar to the 2014 stat line of 67 catches, 862 yards, and five touchdowns. Despite some pre-season buzz of increased usage, Kelce only improved in 2015 by 16 targets, five receptions and 13 yards. While the Kansas City offense is very conservative, too few of the targets are pointed at Kelce. Jeremy Maclin will see his share, and Jamaal Charles will once again be a factor out of the backfield. If target volume remains similar for Kelce this season, he'll need a flurry of touchdowns to challenge for premiere tight end status.

Eifert suffered an ankle injury in the 2015 Pro Bowl but deferred surgery until late May. Now it appears that he'll be missing several games to begin the regular season. Sadly, injuries are nothing new for Eifert. His 2014 season was ended in Week 1 following a nasty dislocated elbow. He missed three games last year with head and neck injuries but still put together four multi-TD games. While there is a good connection with Andy Dalton, the nature of the Cincinnati offense leads to some boom or bust days for the tight end. Eifert is at his best near the goal line, where Jeremy Hill serves as a touchdown vulture. More targets in other areas of the field could be available for Eifert thanks to the departures of Marvin Jones and Mohamed Sanu. Eifert just needs to get back on the field to capitalize on them.

The last time New Orleans had a tall, fast tight end who couldn't block his name was Jimmy Graham. Indeed, awesome things can happen playing with Drew Brees. After a slow start last year, Ben Watson had the best season of his career at age 35. Meanwhile, the four years Fleener spent in Indianapolis resulted in some flashes of fantasy goodness, but they were far too inconsistent thanks to Fleener's inefficient play. Sharing time with Dwayne Allen also depressed the numbers to a degree. New Orleans is a believer, though, targeting Fleener in free agency this offseason and signing him very early in the process to a five-year deal. If the Saints are this excited to get Fleener on the roster, fantasy owners should be as well.

Barnidge is a fifth-round pick from the 2008 NFL Draft who just had what is far and away the best year of his career -- at age 30. He finished the season with 125 targets, 79 receptions, more than 1,000 yards and nine touchdowns. From 2008-14, Barnidge recorded just 603 yards combined. Perhaps even more impressive is doing all of that with lackluster quarterbacks such as Josh McCown, Johnny Manziel, and Austin Davis throwing him the ball. Heading into this year Robert Griffin III will get every opportunity to seize the starting job in training camp. At the moment, Barnidge's only serious competition for targets appear to be scat back Duke Johnson and rookie wide receiver Corey Coleman, who comes from the same college offense as Griffin. The move to a Hue Jackson/Pep Hamilton offense should also be an improvement and keep Barnidge very relevant as the 1 or 1A option in the passing game.

Last year saw the passing offense in Jacksonville rise from 31st into the top 10 thanks to the emergence of their young wide receivers and a struggling rushing attack. During his time in Denver, a series of ankle and knee issues prevented Thomas from ever playing a full 16-game season. Then after signing a big contract last offseason to play for the Jags, Thomas suffered a broken hand and didn't get onto the field until Week 5. Given the missed time and having to learn a new system, Thomas' fantasy production understandably varied from week to week, although he did score a touchdown in four consecutive games from Week 11 through Week 14. Over the last three seasons, Thomas has scored 29 touchdowns in 39 games. Staying healthy for 16 games would go a long way toward elevating his fantasy value in 2016.

Since Ertz entered the league in 2013, fantasy owners have been clamoring for him to be utilized in the Eagle' passing game. During the back half of last year, they finally got their wish. Over the final seven games, Ertz was targeted nine or more times on four occasions. He also recorded more than 95 yards in three of the team's last four games. Veteran tight end Brent Celek is the superior blocker, so the team might benefit if Ertz detached from the formation more often. Jordan Matthews is at his best playing in the slot, leaving a lot of opportunities on the outside. New head coach Doug Pederson hails from an Andy Reid system that seemed to overlook Travis Kelce's skills on a weekly basis. However, the eagles inked Ertz to a lucrative, long-term deal and will hopefully want to see a return on their investment.

Now 36 years old, Gates is not a safe bet to sustain a high level of performance over 16 full games but is still very capable of posting a big game now and again. Gates scored a dozen touchdowns in 2014, the second most of his career. Prior to the 2015 season he was suspended four games for a failed PED test. In his first game back, Gates stormed to nine catches on 11 targets for 92 yards and a pair of touchdowns. Hip and knee issues didn't keep Gates out of the lineup, but limited him down the stretch. It's notable that San Diego took the first tight end of the 2016 draft, investing a second-round pick on Hunter Henry out of Arkansas. Of course, after 13 seasons in the league Gates has seen a lot of backups come and go. Rookie tight ends rarely make an impact, but even so, this could be the final year of fantasy relevance for Gates.

Pittsburgh signed Green to a four-year deal following the retirement of Heath Miller. The former Charger is quick, tall, and athletic but never got much of a chance playing behind the ageless, and enchanted, Antonio Gates. All four of Green's touchdowns last season came during the first six games and from that point forward, he never caught more than two passes in a game the rest of the season. Delanie Walker's move from San Francisco to Tennessee is the blueprint for a successful backup-to-starter signing. The Steelers would certainly take similar results. And there will be opportunity for pass catchers outside of Antonio Brown as suspended playmaker Martavis Bryant was targeted 92 times last year. Green can provide weekly starter value by garnering even a modest amount of those chances.

Allen scored eight touchdowns in 2014 but only hauled in a single score last year as the entire Colts' passing game struggled. On the plus side, fellow tight end Coby Fleener left for New Orleans in free agency which should help Allen's target count even if his exact fit in the offense remains somewhat unclear. Indianapolis is loaded with burners like T.Y. Hilton, Donte Moncrief, and Phillip Dorsett, and while Allen displayed above average agility at the Combine back in 2012, he lacks the speed to keep up with the surrounding targets. Allen has also missed three games in each of the last two years. When healthy, he's shaping up to be very touchdown dependent and is probably best-kept in the bin of streamers.

Witten enters his 14th professional season at age 34 never having scored double-digit touchdowns in a season. However, Witten had been a perennial top-10 fantasy tight end until 2015, having just made the cutoff in 2014. That season was brought down by an offense that wasn't looking to throw the ball much thanks to DeMarco Murray's rushing success. Last year saw an ugly parade of four different quarterbacks attempting to throw the ball to Witten with predictably disastrous results. Assuming Tony Romo can stay healthy for an entire season, Witten could serve as a passable option in PPR formats. He's a boring pick, but perhaps the safest one to make once the elite options at tight end have all been selected.

Ebron got better in his second year, although he went through a bit of a mid-season swoon after an otherwise solid start to 2015. He's big and fast for the tight end position, yet his poor Combine agility scores could mean that he is simply overrated from a physical standpoint. That being said, Detroit liked what they saw enough to take Ebron with the 10th overall pick in 2014. Calvin Johnson's retirement leaves quite a few targets on the table -- targets that could theoretically be shared with Ebron. That may not come to fruition, though. Golden Tate has flashed No. 1 receiver ability during games Megatron has missed. Free agent signee Marvin Jones and the sure-handed Theo Riddick are also very good bets to see more looks than Ebron. Best of luck trying to tackle the tight ends in New England. We all know that Rob Gronkowski is an absolute stud. But Bennett, who tips the scales at over 270 pounds, is also a very difficult man to bring to the ground. Chicago ended their relationship with Bennett last year after Week 13 by placing him on season-ending injured reserved with broken ribs. He was disgruntled throughout the year after the Bears didn't offer him a new contract and eventually he was traded this offseason to the Patriots to play out the final year of his current deal. Gronk has not missed significant time over the last two seasons, leaving Bennett as a touchdown-dependent streamer in favorable matchups.

Week 1 of 2015 saw ASJ post five receptions on seven targets for 110 yards and a pair of touchdowns. Unfortunately, a shoulder issue suffered in the following game would keep him out of action until Week 13. The team was extremely cautious with him during the rehab and during his return to play. His production down the stretch was modest, although he did notch scores in Weeks 15 and 16. Regardless, third-year receiver Mike Evans should dominate the targets, and rightfully so. There could a market for the secondary looks, however. Vincent Jackson missed six games last year and turned 33 in January. Sharp fantasy owners will note that Seferian-Jenkins was tossed out of practice during June OTAs and responded by chastising the team on Twitter. Unless Seferian-Jenkins matures quickly and rights the ship, all his talent won't keep him in the team's starting lineup.

In 2015 Cameron joined the Dolphins and played in all 16 games for the first time in his career, yet he was nearly invisible in Miami's offense. Cameron opened 2015 with two decent games only to catch eight passes on a whopping 25 targets over the next three. From there he was only targeted 34 times over the final 11 games. This offseason Cameron agreed to take a pay cut hoping get his career back on track under new head coach Adam Gase, who utilized the tight end quite often as the offensive coordinator for Denver and Chicago. Even so, Miami has an interesting mix of intriguing, young wide receivers making Cameron's outlook somewhat bleak.

Miller was seldom used and routinely injured from 2009 up until last year in Chicago. This offseason saw former starter Martellus Bennett shipped away to New England, a decision made easier thanks to Miller's production over the second half of the season. Miller saw six or more targets in five of the final six games and scored five touchdowns in that same six-game span. Even at age 32 there's a chance for Miller to deliver some useful production, especially playing alongside a pair of wide receivers with health concerns in Alshon Jeffery and Kevin White.

Simply put, a torn patellar tendon can be a devastating injury. Graham, who turns 30 in November, suffered one in Week 12 last year against Pittsburgh. While there were a few decent moments during his first season with Seattle, Graham was too often asked to do real tight end stuff, like blocking. New Orleans often kept him detached from the formation and used him almost exclusively as a pass catcher, making the Seahawks' acquisition somewhat puzzling. There's been optimism that Graham will be able to play in Week 1, but a setback and a subsequent trip to the PUP list doesn't seem that farfetched either. Perhaps as insurance, or simply looking long-term, Seattle invested a third-round pick in tight end Nick Vannett from Ohio State. Frankly, Seattle played better without Graham last year, and one has to wonder if the team will keep him in 2017 when he's due a cool $10 million.

The Combine numbers weren't great for Walford; it was mainly his college production that helped him get taken in the third round of last year's draft. There was a mid-season stretch where Walford scored three touchdowns in four games, but his overall volume of receptions was always lacking. An off-season ATV accident injured Walford's knee, although the team doesn't seem overly concerned about him missing any time heading into 2016. While there is room in the offense for Walford to grow, Oakland is likely to keep funneling their passing opportunities through Amari Cooper and Michael Crabtree.

While the Packers had an obvious attraction to Cook -- he's a fast tight end, something they haven't had on their roster for three years -- the eighth-year veteran had reason to be even more drawn to Green Bay. Aaron Rodgers will be the 12th quarterback to throw Cook a pass in the NFL. Before him, the best probably was Matt Hasselbeck. Last year was a low point, however, with Nick Foles and Case Keenum splitting time as the Rams' starter. It's no surprise Cook's production dipped in 2015, given their struggles. So Cook arrives in Green Bay with a sense of urgency, facing a crossroads in his career. Working with Rodgers clearly gives Cook an edge in getting back on track. Recent foot surgery will require you keep an eye on his recovery, but all indications are Cook will be ready for Week 1.

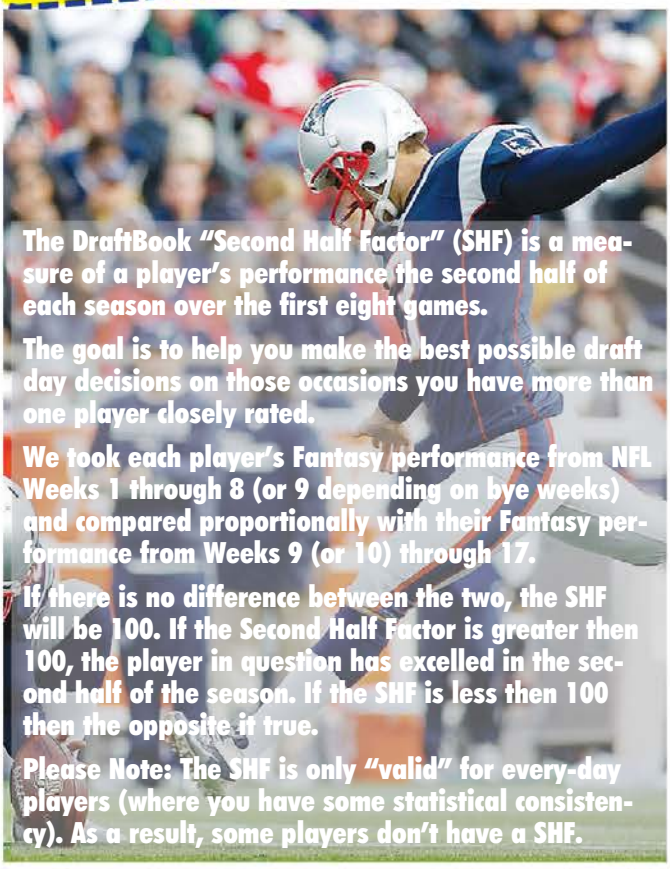
Clay is a talented athlete but has been an extremely erratic performer stretching back to his years in Miami. Clay did see 13 targets, converting them into nine catches, in two early season games, yet he was also targeted five or fewer times in a total of seven games. Clay also had four games in which he was held to just a single catch. If Sammy Watkins' broken foot keeps him out for a stretch in 2016, Clay could see some early value until Watkins returns. Ideally though, Buffalo wants to play great defense and run the ball with LeSean McCoy, leaving limited chances in the passing game, which doesn't move the needle much for Clay.



The DraftBook "Second Half Factor" (SHF) is a measure of a player's performance the second half of each season over the first eight games.

The goal is to help you make the best possible draft day decisions on those occasions you have more than one player closely rated.

We took each player's Fantasy performance from NFL Weeks 1 through 8 (or 9 depending on bye weeks) and compared proportionally with their Fantasy performance from Weeks 9 (or 10) through 17.

If there is no difference between the two, the SHF will be 100. If the Second Half Factor is greater then 100, the player in question has excelled in the second half of the season. If the SHF is less then 100 then the opposite it true.

Please Note: The SHF is only "valid" for every-day players (where you have some statistical consistency). As a result, some players don't have a SHF.

In recent years Gostkowski has consistently been the first foot taken in our game of imaginary football. Over the last three years Gostkowski has made 93 percent of his field goal attempts, including an impressive 10 of 12 on kicks from 50 yards and beyond. Tom Brady's pending four-game suspension does not seem to be diminishing the demand for Gostkowski in early fantasy drafts, so you may need to pull the trigger a round early if you want to secure Gostkowski's services. Brady's eventual return should quickly elevate the New England offense back to above average status, keeping Gostkowski flush with opportunities.

Last season Hauschka successfully connected on all six of the field goals he attempted from 50-plus yards. Highlighting the crazy randomness of fantasy kickers, Hauschka had attempted a combined total of seven long distance field goals over the previous two seasons. Even though he missed four extra points in 2015, Hauschka made 93.5 percent of his field goals and has cemented himself as one of the very best kickers in the league.

After leading the league with 56 extra points in 2014, Bailey only attempted 25 PATs last year thanks to a struggling offense. On the plus side, his 93.8 percent field goal accuracy was tops in the NFL. Bailey has also made five or more 50-plus yard field goals in three consecutive seasons. Clearly, there are no issues with accuracy or distance in his game. A healthy and effective Dallas offense should have Bailey back to 40+ extra point attempts and a return to weekly dependability for fantasy squads.

4) Adam VINATIERI — IND

After entering the league in the 1996 NFL draft, Vinatieri turns 44 in December and is the oldest active player in the NFL. After playing 10 seasons in New England, this will be his 11th campaign in Indianapolis. Despite getting older, he's been doing a lot more from long-range lately. Over the last five seasons, Vinatieri is 17 of 24 on kicks from 50-plus yards. From 2003-10 he was 2 of 9 from that distance, barely blips on the radar in comparison. A healthy offense in 2014 allowed Vinatieri to top the league in field goal percentage (with a career-high 96.8 percent) and his 50 extra points were the second-most in his career. Vinatieri missed three PATs last year, but still converted 92.6 percent of his 25 field goal attempts. A healthy Andrew Luck should help Vinatieri return to form in 2016.

Despite a decline in accuracy over the last three years there is still a lot to like about Tucker. For starters, he has led the league in field goal attempts two of the last three seasons. Last year Tucker paced the league with 10 tries from 50-plus yards, although he only made four. In 2014, he was a similarly-disappointing 4 of 9 from such distances. However, Tucker began his career converting a stellar 10 of 11 long range tries from 2012-13. A return to that type of success could elevate Tucker to top of the 2016 kicking class.

6) Graham GANO — CAR

As CBSSports.com recently noted, Gano has established himself as one of the better kickers in the league. He converted 30-of-36 field goal attempts and 56-of-59 extra point tries for a franchise record and career high 146 points last year -- due in part to playing alongside an offense run by NFL MVP Cam Newton, who propelled the Panthers to impressive scoring totals. Newton's ability to keep the offense moving were a major factor in Gano ranking second in points in the NFL behind New England's Stephen Gostkowski (151). Can he continue that run? It's not a reach to believe he can. Gano has converted at least 80 percent of his field goal attempts each of the last four seasons and has attempted 35 or more field goals each of the last two. CBS notes that he' a little spotty from 50-plus yards, but that shouldn't keep you from rolling with him as your primary kicker this season.

7) Mason CROSBY — GNB

Since deciding to stick with Crosby after his abysmal field goal percentage of 63.6 back in 2012, Green Bay has been rewarded. Over the last three years, Crosby has made 85.7 percent of his field goal attempts. Despite the big improvements in accuracy, Crosby was a headache for fantasy owners last year, recording a single field goal in six different games and none in four others. The Packers' offense should be back on track in 2016, making Crosby a rosterable option once again.

8) Chandler CATANZARO — ARI

EXP. 3RD YEAR -- AGE: 25 -- HT: 6-3 -- WT: 200-- BYE: 9

Even though Catanzaro missed five extra points last year, he was one of eight qualified kickers who converted more than 90 percent of their field goal attempts. He was also one of only two kickers to attempt and make a dozen of the short and boring, 20-29 yard variety. Long distance efforts last season limited Catanzaro, who missed on his only two attempts from 50-plus yards. He was, however, 2 of 3 from long distance as a rookie in 2014 so there is hope for better results this season.

9) Blair WALSH — MIN

Walsh has led the league in made field goals twice in his four-year career. As a rookie, he was a perfect 10 of 10 from 50-plus yards, and over the last two years, he's a combined 11 of 17 from that range. Unfortunately, Walsh was last seen missing a 27-yard field goal in the bitter cold that should have beaten Seattle in the first round of the playoffs. Regardless of the miscue, Walsh still is among the top kickers in the game. One unknown for Walsh heading into the season is U.S. Bank Stadium, the team's new home. While it has a fixed roof, there are five large glass doors that could be opened in warmer temperatures, allowing wind to play a role in the kicking game.

10) Cairo SANTOS — KAN

A Conservative Alex Smith at quarterback combined with Andy Reid's brand of coaching can become a kicker's best friend. Last year, Santos had some monster games that featured single-game field goal attempts of six and even seven tries. The trend wasn't new; back in 2014, he ended his rookie season with nine field goal attempts in two games. In two playoff games last year, Santos was a combined 5 for 5 in both extra points and field goals. Expect more of the same in 2016.

Entering his 14th pro season at age 37, Brown has reestablished himself as one of the better kickers in the league. A brutal 2011 ushered him out of the league until Cincinnati picked him up late in the following season. A playoff-clinching game-winner led to an off-season deal with New York, where all Brown has done is hit field goals at a near-92 percent clip. Last season he finished as a top-5 fantasy kicker, making 93.8 percent of his field goal attempts and converting the fifth-most extra points.

McManus kicked for Denver back in 2014, but lost the job to Connor Barth during the season before eventually returning to the team as the kickoff specialist. Last year McManus won the placekicking job during training camp and the subsequent performances were far more consistent than his first go-round in the Mile High City. En route to a Super Bowl victory, McManus was a perfect 10 for 10 on field goal attempts in Denver's three playoff victories. His track record is somewhat short, but an accurate McManus is a useful fantasy commodity.

We don't actually know who the Saints kicker is going to be. Kai Forbath has been on the roster the longest, but he will have to compete with Barth, who made 23 of 28 field goal attempts and 25 of 26 extra points for the Buccaneers last season after he re-signed with the team in October. He was released earlier this month after Tampa Bay traded up to draft Florida State's Roberto Aguayo in the second round. Barth has made 84.8 percent of his field goals in his career with the Chiefs (2008), Buccaneers (2009-2012, 2015) and Broncos (2014). Forbath, an in-season addition last year, made 9 of 13 field goal attempts for the Saints, including a game-winning 50-yarder against the Giants in Week 8. He made 33 of 34 extra point attempts. Bottom line? Whoever wins this competition will be of fantasy interest. As long as they remain on the roster.

All last season, players were asked to embrace HC Mike Tomlin's mantra of next man up, as injuries mounted. And one position nobody expected to require that mindset be called up so strong was at kicker. Boswell was the Steelers fourth kicker of the year, following Shaun Suisham and Garrett Hartley who were both injured, and then Josh Scobee who was released because of his ineffectiveness. When Boswell signed with the Steelers last October, he had yet to kick in an NFL game. With Suisham's release in June, the Steelers made it clear they're fine rolling with Boswell, who hit 90.6 percent of his field goals (29 of 32) including 2 of 2 from 50-plus yards last season.

At 41 years old Dawson is still a good kicker, but the San Francisco offense didn't provide him many opportunities in 2015. Among the kickers that played in all 16 regular season games, Dawson attempted a league-worst 21 extra points. He was one of seven kickers to attempt double-digit field goals from 20-29 yards, which wouldn't be a bad thing had Dawson received more than 27 total tries the entire year. The offense should improve under Chip Kelly's direction, if for no other reason than it couldn't get any worse.

16) Roberto AGUAYO — TB

In one of the biggest surprises of the NFL draft, the Buccaneers traded up into the second round and selected Aguayo at No. 59 overall. Aguayo is the highest drafted kicker since 2005. He is the ninth kicker chosen in the first two rounds of the common draft era, which dates to 1967. Aguayo produced a sterling college career. He made 69 of 78 field goals and all 198 extra points from 2013 to 2015. The most accurate kicker in NCAA history, Aguayo had a .9673 conversion rate (267-of-276). In Tampa, Aguayo will be reunited with quarterback Jameis Winston, who spoke highly of the kicker when the two were teammates at Florida State in 2014. The Bucs struggled with their kicking game early last season. They believe Aguayo can change that.

The former Bronco missed four games in 2014 for violating the NFL substance abuse policy, leading to his eventual release from Denver. He was picked up quickly by Detroit and after a shaky debut earned a three-year deal coming into the 2015 season. Last year, Prater missed three extra points, but posted a strong 91.7 percent field goal percentage. The offense no longer has Calvin Johnson but will have Jim Bob Cooter calling the shots from Day 1 after his successful stint as the interim offensive coordinator during the second half of last season. Prater made 15 of his 22 field goals after Cooter's Week 8 promotion.

Coons had a historically efficient rookie season, knocking down 18 straight field goals to set a league record for the most consecutive field goals to begin a career. He made 28-of-32 attempts on the season and buried a game-winner against the Ravens in a 33-30 overtime win in October. As accurate as Coons was under 50 yards last year, his long-distance kicks kept getting block in part due to the low trajectory on his kicks. But Coons and the Browns worked to correct the problems this offseason. According to the team's official web site, Coons has the basics down now. He better. The Browns added Patrick Murray to the roster in June. Murray had an impressive season in 2014 with the Buccaneers. If Murray still has a strong leg, he should be viewed as serious competition to Coons.

The Rams are taking Zuerlein with them to Los Angeles. In April the team signed Zuerlein to a one-year deal hoping the acclaimed leg strength re-emerges in the Pacific Time zone. Currently, Zuerlein's career field goal percentage (78.2) ranks at the very bottom among active kickers. Last year, Zuerlein did attempt nine from 50-plus yards, which tied for second-most in the league. However, he only made three of them. For the season he posted a career-low66.7 percent field goal conversion rate. While Zuerlein has been decent from inside of 40 yards, the team's limited offensive ceiling and his struggles with accuracy make him difficult to consider owning, especially in a league that deducts points for missed field goals.

As a rookie last year, Lambo posted a field goal percentage of 81.3 percent that was watered down by seven misses over the Chargers' final five games. His 16 attempts from 40-49 yards tied for the most in the league, but Lambo missed five of them. From 50-plus yards, however, he was more than fine connecting on 4 of 5 attempts from long range. A healthy San Diego offense could pave the way for significant kicking production from Lambo in year 2.

After shuffling in and out of the league since 2005, Novak took over as Houston's kicker after three games last season and performed well enough to be re-signed in March. On kicks inside of 50 yards he was a perfect 18 of 18. The only hiccups came on long balls, where Novak was a pedestrian 2 of 5. He also missed a pair of extra points. In addition to the benefit of playing his home games indoors, Novak finds himself in a very interesting spot given the changes made to the Texans' offense. Improved quarterback play could elevate Novak into a weekly starter, like he was in 2013.

Caleb Sturgis and Parkey are expected to compete for the starting kicker job this season in Philadelphia. As iSportsWeb.com reminded readers, the Eagles struck gold with Parkey back in 2014 when he set the rookie record for points (150). However, with Sturgis' serviceable replacing and Parkey coming off of an injury that sidelined him for multiple months, the Eagles need to decide on their next long-time kicker. Sturgis excelled in the 40-49 yard range (4/4), but his overall percentages were lower half of the league. Among qualified kickers, Sturgis was 25th in FG percentage and 19th in extra point percentage. Parkey was more effective -- albeit with limited samples. For now, Parkey should be the favorite to be the Eagles' kicker in 2016 but don't jump to conclusions until you have to. Whichever of the two wins the job will be of fantasy interest.

Why is Bryant such a value this year? After all, he plays with a fairly potent offense -- one with the potential to be among the league's most productive. Well, the six games he missed due to injury last year are one reason. Another? Bryant had his first season below 85 percent field goals made in 2015 when he notched just 14 of 18 tries, with three misses coming from 40-plus yards. In addition, the injury raises some concern about Bryant's age. He has 14 years under his belt and just turned 41. So, as Fansided recently pointed out, Bryantâ€™s days in the league are numbered. The Falcons realize this. They signed Nick Rose out of the University of Texas to compete with Bryant for the 2016 starting job. Make sure Bryant wins that battle before you invest on draft day.

OFF-SEASON GRADE B+

Bruce Arians	Amos Jones	James Bettcher	Harold Goodwin	13-3-0

The Cardinals were close to a Super Bowl berth in 2015, and the offseason seemed to reflect that. Arizona did very little to disrupt the roster and hopes to see improvements in key areas to take the next step in 2016. That starts at running back, where second-year David Johnson is being touted as the new featured back. Chris Johnson had a rebirth in Arizona and was re-signed this offseason, but David Johnson has fresh legs. Carson Palmer has one more year in the sun (fans hope) and one of the league's best and deepest receiving corps. Where Arizona invested this offseason was in front of Palmer; two of the team's six draft choices were offensive linemen, and the team attracted nasty Evan Mathis to bring more experience to the interior.

The biggest defensive addition, of course, was Chandler Jones, who led the Patriots in sacks last season (12.5). Arizona's top draft choice was one of the most intriguing prospects in the draft. Many felt defensive tackle Robert Nkemdiche could be the No. 1 overall prospect during the 2015 season, but he experienced a (strange) "fall." But, whereas his Ole Miss teammate Laremy Tunsil was labeled a character risk, many scouts believe Nkemdiche is the victim of a few poor choices. The Cardinals ranked fifth in yards allowed and seventh in points allowed – with few changes, Nkemdiche can only help the club improve. Arizona also added a pair of cornerbacks through the draft and picked up former Chiefs safety Tyvon Branch to aid the secondary.

Our Take: The Cardinals' offseason was quiet but impactful. Mathis is fresh off a title in Denver, and Nkemdiche has the size and supporting talent to be the league's top rookie defender.

Once considered the "next in line" to contend for a Super Bowl, the Falcons have fallen hard. The passing game was a one-man show last season, with Julio Jones racking up a league-high 204 targets – the most by an NFL receiver in three years. That's too many for one man, even Jones, and the Falcons finally parted ways with long-time trusted wideout Roddy White. They signed Mohamed Sanu to replace him and hope rookie Austin Hooper can add depth behind Jacob Tamme at tight end.

The prize of the off-season may be center Alex Mack, who will turn 31 this season but has been one of the best (and smartest) interior offensive linemen in pro football for some time. The offensive line is a strength for Atlanta; the team allowed just 32 sacks and helped a second-year running back (Devonta Freeman) gain more than 1,000 yards. And the unit added another interior lineman prospect late in this year's draft for padding.

Defensively, the Falcons ranked in the middle of the road in run, pass and scoring defense. The unit lacks "name" players but has a few up-and-coming prospects. The Falcons added a pair of linebackers through the draft, as well as veterans Courtney Upshaw and Sean Weatherspoon via free agency. Defensive end Derrick Shelby, who had 3.5 sacks and forced two fumbles for Miami last year, joins the mix. That can't hurt Atlanta, as no Falcons defender had more than four sacks last season. Atlanta used its top pick on Florida safety Keanu Neal, who could step into a starting role immediately.

John Harbaugh	Jerry Rosburg	Dean Pees	Marc Trestman	5-11-0

To protect quarterback Joe Flacco the Ravens used their top selection in April on tackle Ronnie Staley, passing on Laremy Tunsil and other more hyped prospects. It's the safe move -- the kind the Ravens routinely make with success. Staley is 6-foot-5 and more than 300 pounds and should help protect Flacco for the remainder of his career.

In the backfield, Justin Forsett is still expected to be the primary ball carrier. He averaged 4.2 yards per carry last season but was healthy for just 10 games. The Ravens picked up mid-round selection Kenneth Dixon to add a little competition in camp; don't be surprised if Dixon pushes hard for reps. The bigger concern for Baltimore has been at wide receiver, and the team did little to fill the holes. Steve Smith, 37, is beyond "aging" and Breshad Perriman may not return healthy for the start of the season. At one time fans would have greeted the signing of Mike Wallace with cheers, but after a failed stint in Minnesota no one believes Wallace can have much of an impact. Ben Watson had a good year for the Saints, but fantasy owners should expect half that level of production in this offense (if that).

On defense, the Ravens parted with a pair of familiar faces at linebacker. Daryl Smith led the club in tackles in 2015, and Courtney Upshaw was a steady presence in his four years (although never living up to his second-round draft slot). Second-round pick Kamalei Correa will be one of the players asked to fill the need. Safety Eric Weddle had worn out his welcome in San Diego, but he is an outstanding on-field leader and still capable of making impact plays.

Our Take: The Staley pick will pay dividends for years, and Weddle could be an immediate smash in this defense.

Rex Ryan	Danny Crossman	Dennis Thurman	Greg Roman	8-8-0

When you talk big and walk big, you're always a target. Rex Ryan said this offseason he's on the hot seat in Buffalo, and admitted he doesn't much care. He thinks this team can win and doesn't mind saying so. In a division dominated by the Patriots for two decades, it's still bold, even for Ryan. For Buffalo to knock New England from its perch, the offense will need to see continued development from Tyrod Taylor and more consistency from the receiving corps. The team lost Chris Hogan to free agency and Percy Harvin to retirement (no biggie) and hopes Sammy Watkins can become even better in Year 3. The offense must also feed backs LeSean McCoy and Karlos Williams and even Mike Gillislee. And if three mouths weren't enough, the Bills used a fifth-round pick on Arkansas' Jonathan Williams. It helped that the team tagged tackle Cordy Glenn and re-signed guard Richie Incognito this offseason.

Defensively, the Bills said goodbye to Mario Williams – a cornerstone on which the revamped Bills' defense was built a few years ago – but replaced him with top pick Shaq Lawson, who notched 9.5 sacks for Clemson last year. Lawson can fit at outside linebacker in the Bills' 3-4. The team also padded the defensive line with Ohio State's Adolphus Washington (third round). The secondary lost Leodis McKelvin, who is still a very good cornerback but has reached the ripe age of 30. The Bills did sign fifth-year Robert Blanton to compete at safety.

Our Take: The Bills took care of a few in-house contracts, and deserve kudos for stockpiling the front seven.

The Panthers drew criticism from fans everywhere for failing to pay for Josh Norman and complaining of how the market ruined their chances of inking Kawann Short to a long-term deal. But that's the price you pay for being a contender, and the best teams are frugal (it's precisely why the Packers, Patriots and Seahawks have remained competitive). Losing Norman stings, but we will learn soon whether Norman helped make this defense or if the defense made him. To help replace him the Panthers landed Brandon Boykin, who joins his third team in as many seasons.

Carolina also used its second-, third- and fifth-round selections on defensive backs. The future is there, but this team is ready to contend again now. First-round pick Vernon Butler will add more punch to one of the NFC's toughest front sevens.

The offense did spend some money to lock up Michael Oher to a long-term deal, and is most excited about welcoming back wide receiver Kelvin Benjamin after a year off. Benjamin could be a true No. 1 target for Cam Newton, something the offense lacked in its 2015 campaign. Early reports suggest he's back to full go.

Carolina also gave Ron Rivera a much deserved new deal expected to be worth $6 million a season. It's hard to argue he shouldn't be one of the top-5 highest paid coaches in the league after the job he's done the past few seasons.

Our Take: Carolina's decision not to spend money may have short-term ramifications, but long-term should prove to be the smart play.

OFF-SEASON GRADE C+

John Fox	Jeff Rodgers	Vic Fangio	Dowell Loggains	6-10-0

The Bears have a reputation on defense, one that has taken a hit in recent years. Chicago made strides last season, but still ranked 20th in points allowed (after ranking 31st and 30th the two years prior). In an attempt to cure the defensive woes the team reworked its linebacking corps, signing Danny Trevathan and Jerrell Freeman and using their first-round pick (ninth overall) on University of Georgia stud Leonard Floyd. The secondary has some solid pieces already in place, and the front line will benefit from the addition of Akiem Hicks, who can be an impact player.

Of course, the offense starts and stops at the feet of Jay Cutler, who may never win a championship but could finally earn some respect. This year Cutler must manage without Matt Forte, who hit the free agent market and found a new home in the Big Apple. Forte is at an age when front offices lose faith in a running back. That puts pressure on Jeremy Langford and others to cover the rushing duties, leaving most of the work to Cutler and the passing attack.

Alshon Jeffrey showed last year he does not need Brandon Marshall to shine, but will appreciate having Kevin White this season. White missed his entire rookie season with an injury but early reports suggest he will be back at full health.

Our Take: Chicago is taking steps, but they are too small to make ground on Minnesota and Green Bay. Letting go of Forte was a necessary business move, but it will sting nonetheless.

Cincinnati BENGALS

Marvin Lewis	Darrin Simmons	Paul Guenther	Ken Zampese	12-4-0

If not for a few bonehead plays (hello, Adam Jones! hello, Vontaze Burfict!) it might have been the Bengals hoisting the Lombardi Trophy earlier this year. Just when this team was on the cusp of greatness, doh! Burfict is now suspended three games, but when he was playing smart football he was an impact defender. The defense did not need to do much this offseason to regroup, although it did lose safety Reggie Nelson. The team used its top pick on cornerback William Jackson III, who may be every bit as good as Jacksonville's top corner prospect Jalen Ramsey, and has a solid secondary surrounding him to ease his growth.

Maybe the worry heading into 2016 is at wide receiver, where the team lost its Nos. 2 and 3 receiver options from last year. Marvin Jones and Mohamed Sanu found new homes where they might see more attention -- away from the all-too-demanding hands of A.J. Green -- leaving Cincinnati with holes to fill. The team relies on tight end Tyler Eifert and is encouraged by his backup, Tyler Kroft. And Giovani Bernard caught almost 50 balls last year. Still, nothing is a substitute for a solid No. 2 wideout. It's likely to be Brandon LaFell, or maybe Brandon Tate, or maybe rookie Tyler Boyd. That position battle is among the most intriguing for fantasy owners this summer.

Our Take: The Bengals are still knocking, and except for the lingering question at wide receiver this offseason was steady and safe (and smart).

Hue Jackson	Chris Tabor	Ray Horton	Pep Hamilton	3-13-0

Oh those lovable Browns! What can you say, really? The team traded out of the top of the first round of the NFL Draft in exchange for a bounty of picks -- that was the highlight of the offseason. Outside of what the future may (or may not) hold, Cleveland does not appear to be any farther ahead than it was a year ago. If anything the makeup of this team is even cloudier.

At quarterback, the team ditched Johnny Manziel and won the Robert Griffin III "sweepstakes" to give Josh McCown a challenge in camp (and Austin Davis is still on board). Rookie Cody Kessler only further complicates the situation. If you're confused now, wait until we dive into the receiving corps. Josh Gordon can apply for reinstatement, but who can say what his conditioning will be like after a year away, or if he's matured over these past months. Still, if he does return, Gordon is a potential game-changer. The Browns lost Travis Benjamin in free agency but used the No. 15 pick to grab Corey Coleman, then picked four more (yep, five total) wide receivers in April. Strength in numbers, and certainly this has the potential to give Griffin -- or McCown, or Kessler -- a group to grow with. Losing Alex Mack (and Mitchell Schwartz) will affect the offensive line, but the Browns did add a couple of potential replacements in the draft.

Demario Davis was the top defensive signing of the offseason, although rookie defensive ends Emmanuel Ogbah and Carl Nassib will have the greatest impact, possibly even in Year 1. Certainly they cannot hurt a defense that logged just 29 sacks and allowed an average of 27.0 points per game last year.

Our Take: New coach Hue Jackson will clean things up in camp, but there is so much to address it will take a while. The draft trade gave the Browns a lot of picks to begin their rebuilding effort.

Dallas COWBOYS

Jason Garrett	Rich Bisaccia	Rod Marinelli	Scott Linehan	4-12-0

The Cowboys made do without a franchise running back last year, and while Darren McFadden outperformed expectations he still did not satisfy. The team inked veteran workhorse Alfred Morris but made a bigger splash in the draft by using the No. 4 overall pick on Ohio State's Ezekiel Elliott. Most expect Elliott to pick up where DeMarco Murray left off in 2014 -- a tall order, to be sure -- but Elliott has the physique and big-time experience to pull it off. Morris was used up a few seasons ago in Washington but could still be a serviceable backup.

Of course, the return of Tony Romo is even bigger news. The team knows it has a shrinking window to win and that can only happen with a healthy Romo in the pocket. Dez Bryant is back, and Terrance Williams is playing for a new contract. Jason Witten is over the hill but plays as well as any veteran tight end ever has, so why doubt him now? The team did add Mississippi State's Dak Prescott in the draft, but he's a long-term option even if Romo suffers another injury.

The defense has holes to fill. The Greg Hardy experiment was regrettable, and both Randy Gregory and Demarcus Lawrence are facing four-game suspensions. The front line is suddenly thin, and the linebacking corps is always under attack, whether it's Sean Lee's shaky health or Ronaldo McClain's status. And we're not even talking secondary, which the Cowboys opted not to address when they selected Elliott in Round 1.

Our Take: Elliott is a game buster, and he'll need to be because the defense will leak weekly.

OFF-SEASON GRADE D+

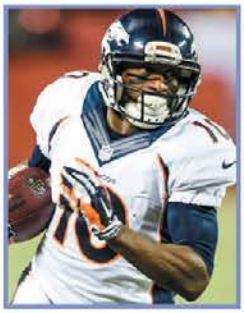
Gary Kubiak	Joe DeCamillis	Wade Phillips	Rick Dennison	12-4-0

Be careful what you wish for. The Broncos appeared to have pushed Peyton Manning into retirement, beginning in early 2015. The team relished the opportunity to see young Brock Osweiler perform but was happy to take the title with Manning under center. Manning said goodbye, and then Osweiler said "Hello, Houston." Hmmm, now what!?

The team called on Mark Sanchez (imagine his head shot next to a yellow pages listing for teams desperate for a short-term quarterback fix) and then selected Paxton Lynch at the end of Round 1. Some scouts believed Lynch was the best quarterback in this draft class, but he was tested by few elite defenses at the college level. Lynch is probably going to win the job early into the season, if not even in camp.



... Because, really, would you start Sanchez (or Trevor Siemian) to defend your Super Bowl title?

The wide receiving corps is intact, and the Broncos added third-round rookie runner Devontae Booker to push C.J. Anderson and Ronnie Hillman in the backfield. The biggest worry for Denver on this side of the ball is the offensive line. They dealt Ryan Clady to the Jets and replaced him by signing Russell Okung. Denver had its share of offensive line woes last year (including the loss of Clady for the entire season) and can ill-afford to have the same issues with less experience under center.

Getting Von Miller inked to a long-term deal was the Broncos' top priority of the offseason (after they found Manning's replacement) but proved more difficult than anticipated. The team lost defensive end Malik Jackson but used a second-round pick on Adam Gotsis of Georgia Tech. Denver also lost linebacker Danny Trevathan.

Our Take: The quarterback fiasco, the handling of Miller's contract. ... Oi vey. Call it an offseason to forget.

Detroit LIONS

HEAD COACH	SPECIAL TEAMS	DEFENSIVE COORDINATOR	OFFENSIVE COORDINATOR	2015 RECORD

What is it with this town? Barry Sanders took an early, unexpected exit, and this offseason Calvin Johnson did the same. It's true, Johnson had not looked like his usual dominant self in 2015, but he is still relatively young (30) and could have had many productive seasons ahead of him. That's all done now.

The passing game has no one ready to fill Johnson's shoes, yet Matthew Stafford's regression is perhaps a bigger immediate concern. Stafford's arm has not provided consistent results for a couple years, and it's possible it has begun to affect his confidence (losing Johnson won't help that department, either). The team paid top dollar for Marvin Jones to complement Golden Tate, but both are best suited to be a No. 2 receiver, and Eric Ebron's development has been slow and painful. And don't expect much help from the running game -- it's as cloudy (and unappealing to fantasy owners) as it's been for the past few seasons. And, no, Stevan Ridley is not going to help.

The defense felt the loss of Ndamukong Suh last year, evident in the rankings (and a full yard more per carry allowed). The team did invest on defense in the draft, including fourth-round safety Miles Killebrew and a potential steal upfront in second-round pick A'Shawn Robinson of Alabama. The defense will take time to rebuild, but the Lions appear to be a team with no choice but to be patient.

Our Take: Detroit said goodbye to one of the game's all-time great receivers. That's as bad as an offseason can get.

Green Bay PACKERS

Mike McCarthy	Ron Zook	Dom Capers	Edgar Bennett	10-6-0

Hear that?? Shh, listen. It's the sound of crickets chirping in Green Bay. Ahh, the peace of another uneventful offseason. The Packers just don't budge. The decisions to re-sign Julius Peppers and recruit veteran tight end Jared Cook are as wild as it gets in the Nordic territory. Green Bay's philosophy seems simple: We compete year after year, why mess with a good thing?

Cook actually could be a very good move. The team has not had a steady tight end since Jermichael Finley's (brief) heyday, and Cook has been underutilized during his career. He's near the end of his career, but just like Peppers, he could enjoy a few big years and a chance to play for the prize. The offense lives and dies by Aaron Rodgers, who had an off year in 2015 and was still among the best. Having Jordy Nelson back will help Rodgers, as will having a lighter Eddie Lacy (the biggest news of the offseason). The wide receiving corps must thin out, as it has too many pieces to keep. Jared Abbrederis and Jeff Janis showed flashes at the end of last season, and will challenge Ty Montgomery and Davante Adams for a spot. Fifth-round pick Trevor Davis is in the mix, too.

The biggest loss on defense was ballhawking Casey Hayward, who had a difficult time playing anything but dime and nickel. Still, he routinely made plays. The team added Kenny Clark in Round 1 to add youth and some athleticism to the front line, where Mike Daniels could use more help. The team invested heavily in the secondary last year, and it's already shown results; Quinten Rollins and Damarious Randall are both a year older and wiser.

Our Take: Still knocking on the door to a championship. The Cook pickup could be the unsung signing of the offseason, and minimal losses helps this team keep its core.

Houston TEXANS

Bill O'Brien	Larry Izzo	Romeo Crennel	George Godsey	9-7-0

In time, this could be the pivotal year Texans fans look back to and recall: "That was when we fit the final pieces together." Houston's improbable second half playoff push last year gave the club some encouragement. The quarterback spot has long been the Achilles heel of the offense, as has Arian Foster's health, but the defense always held together and the offense made just enough plays. To resolve matters, the Texans spent big for Broncos' quarterback Brock Osweiler and dumped Foster for a chance to sign Lamar Miller away from Miami. Two bold moves. Osweiler is no more proven in this league than Matt Schaub was, or Scott Mitchell years before. He had several good games last year for a team that had arguably the league's best defense. But if Osweiler solves Houston's quarterback conundrum he'll be worth the sizable check.

Houston already had one of the league's best young wide receivers in DeAndre Hopkins, and an emerging No. 2 (Jaelen Strong) but still used the draft to add depth. Will Fuller could eventually push Strong for the starting job, and Braxton Miller could play anywhere on the field (and eliminates the need for Houston to keep three quarterbacks on the roster – a nice perk).

When fans think Texans, they immediately think defense. Very little changed this offseason for one of the league's best units. In fact, Houston used its first four picks on offense, ignoring the defense until the fifth and seventh rounds. No one is concerned. If anything, fans just hope the offseason provided players like Jadeveon Clowney with much needed rest.

Our Take: Everyone is wild again about Indianapolis, but if there is a sleeping giant to challenge the Patriots and Broncos it's Houston.

HEAD COACH	SPECIAL TEAMS	DEFENSIVE COORDINATOR	OFFENSIVE COORDINATOR	2015 RECORD

Andrew Luck just wasn't the same player last season. The Colts had invested in veteran signings prior to 2015 and had (what they considered) a Super Bowl caliber roster, but Luck struggled and bad luck found its way through the door. In hindsight we know Luck was injured for much of the year and reports this offseason – along with the fact Indianapolis made him the NFL's highest-paid player with a contract extension signed on June 29 – suggest he's back with a clean bill of health. Phew!

This spring the Colts undid some of what they had tried to do the year before. It became clear Andre Johnson had no more to give, so the team cut him loose. The Colts feel comfortable with T.Y. Hilton and Donte Moncrief, and hope 2015 first-round pick Phillip Dorsett can take a large step in Year 2. The team did lose tight end Coby Fleener to New Orleans. Fleener had given Luck – his former college teammate – a safety net but was never the impact player he was promoted to be. Fleener's draft classmate Dwayne Allen will take over full time. The team is still committed to Frank Gore, in large part because the long list of backs behind him on the depth chart are not feature-back material. The Colts invested four draft picks on the offensive line – a smart decision to prolong Luck's career – including Alabama center Ryan Kelly in Round 1.

What Luck really needs – more than offensive line upgrades – is a better defense. The Colts ranked 25th in points allowed and 26th in yards allowed last season. And their second-leading tackler, Jerrell Freeman, bolted for Chicago. Second-round pick T.J. Green was one of the fastest prospects in this draft class; he'll challenge for time in the lineup.

Our Take: The commitment to the offensive line this offseason shows the Colts are thinking about the long haul, not just their current window to win now.

Jacksonville JAGUARS

OFF-SEASON GRADE A–

Gus Bradley	Mike Mallory	Todd Wash	Greg Olson	5-11-0

Is this team cursed? A year after losing No. 3 overall pick Dante Fowler in a freak off-season workout incident, this year's top pick, cornerback Jalen Ramsey, suffered a torn meniscus. And the Jaguars' 2016 second-round pick, linebacker Myles Jack, plummeted in the draft due to concerns about his knee. If healthy, this trio could be the base for the NFL's defense of the future. Or they could become an example of wasted talent. Jacksonville fans are holding their breath that Fowler, Ramsey and Jack all enter camp healthy.

The additions of Malik Jackson, Prince Amukamara and Tashaun Gipson also fuel the defense. Jackson was one of the most coveted free agent defensive linemen on the market, Amukamara and Gipson give the Jaguars' secondary experience and depth.

T.J. Yeldon had a solid first season (740 yards rushing), but Jacksonville felt the need to add depth at running back. Chris Ivory is only 28 and is coming off a 1,000-yard season for the Jets last year. The duo should help provide balance to the offense. There is much excitement about Blake Bortles' continued development and about the no-name cast of wide receivers he has at his disposal. If Bortles is for real the Jaguars just might have a shot at winning this division.

Our Take: The team's aggressive statement in free agency suggests the front office is for real about competing now.

Kansas City CHIEFS

Andy Reid	Dave Toub	Bob Sutton	Brad Childress & Matt Nagy	11-5-0

Andy Reid should have been named Coach of the Year for 2015. Voters tend to favor a fresh face from a conference frontrunner (Ron Rivera), but Reid used coaching to turn around what appeared to be a lost season after a 1-5 start.

The Chiefs' defense ranked third in the NFL in points allowed and second in turnovers (22) last season. It's the scariest unit in the AFC now that Denver has lost a little oomph, and Kansas City's only setbacks this offseason were the departures of defensive backs Sean Smith and Tyvon Branch -- neither loss a terrible concern. Kansas City used third-, fourth- and sixth-round draft picks on adding help at cornerback. The team's top choice will pad the defensive line (310-pound Mississippi State tackle Chris Jones).

The backfield will welcome back a healthy Jamaal Charles, but it was important last year for this unit to see Charcandrick West and Spencer Ware get touches. The backfield is loaded, and the additions of offensive linemen Mitchell Schwartz and Parker Ehinger (fourth round) should help improve upon one of the league's most efficient units. Kansas City loves its tight ends, but could use more production from the wide receiver position. Rookies Demarcus Robinson and Tyreek Hill will push for time in an offense that features No. 1 Jeremy Maclin too much.

Our Take: If either Robinson or Hill win the No. 2 receiving job in camp this will be a successful draft class.

Jeff Fisher	John Fassel	Gregg Williams	Rob Boras	7-9-0

First, the move to Los Angeles brought some much needed enthusiasm to a franchise that has been stuck in neutral the past few seasons. It's a bigger market and a familiar home, but once the "newness" wears off head coach Jeff Fisher better show improvements on the field. To do that begins under center, where the team mortgaged future picks for the right to draft Cal's Jared Goff. Neither Case Keenum nor Nick Foles took command in St. Louis, and the team may shift to Goff sooner than later.

The team did some major shuffling this offseason beyond the Goff deal. They unloaded fan favorites Chris Long, James Laurinaitis and Jared Cook in one swoop. It's a rebuilding year, but the team has little time so they need to see rookies Pharoh Cooper and Tyler Higbee make an impact for Goff in the passing game, and the Rams hope Quentin Coples can return to the pass rusher he was in his first three seasons with the Jets (16.5 combined sacks). The unit is built around Aaron Donald, but the level of support around their lone stud has diminished from a season ago. And the secondary really did not adequately replace the departures of Janoris Jenkins and Rodney McLeod; no 2016 draft picks were used on the defensive backfield.

Our Take: Fisher has essentially pinned his coaching future on Goff's first season under center. We don't like Fisher's odds of returning in 2017.

Someone had to pick Laremy Tunsil, the potential No. 1 overall pick who slid on draft day due to a bong-related incident. When the smoke cleared, Miami had inherited both a gift and a PR nightmare. Tunsil should protect Ryan Tannehill from Day 1, and he's handled the media circus quite well so far. The team also signed Jermon Bushrod, a sign they are committed to investing around Tannehill for the foreseeable future. At wide receiver, the team ditched veteran Greg Jennings, and Rishard Matthews signed with Tennessee. No worry, as they still have Jarvis Landry and DeVante Parker.

Perhaps the biggest sting of the offseason was the loss of Lamar Miller, who'd established himself as one of the league's best dual-purpose backs. Houston fed him bigger dollars than Miami was willing to spend, perhaps because the Dolphins are sold on Jay Ajayi. They did use a third-round pick on Alabama's Kenyan Drake, and have others in line in case the second-year Ajayi stumbles out of the gate.

The Dolphins are excited by second-round cornerback Xavien Howard, who could push for the spot vacated by Brent Grimes. Up front the defense continues to rework itself. The addition of Ndamukong Suh paid handsomely last year, and now Miami has added veteran defensive end Mario Williams, who may have a couple good years left. The team did lose several lineman, most notably Olivier Vernon, but hopes to see a healthy Cameron Wake back in the lineup.

Minnesota VIKINGS

Mike Zimmer	Mike Priefer	George Edwards	Norv Turner	11-5-0

No matter your allegiance, you have to love what the Vikings have done in recent years. This offseason they added a few more key pieces to their growing (balanced) arsenal. The line picked up veteran Alex Boone and used a fourth round pick on guard Willie Beavers, which brings much needed protection for Teddy Bridgewater, and the receiving corps improved thanks to first round pick Laquon Treadwell. The team found a gem in Stefon Diggs in last year's draft, but has been missing a game breaker. Speedy Mike Wallace failed in that role and now is on to yet another team. Treadwell could be the guy, and seems a good complement to Diggs, who is better suited to be a possession target for Bridgewater. The running game is still the focus, and will continue to be so long as Adrian Peterson is healthy and hungry.

The Vikings ranked fifth in points allowed per game and 13th in yards allowed. Few units in the league are as consistent, yet Minnesota's group is nameless. Anthony Barr could become a star, and Harrison Smith was rewarded this offseason with a new deal, but beyond those two it's a lunch bucket crew that gets the job done. The Vikings added veteran leadership in the secondary by signing Michael Griffin to play alongside Smith at safety. Second-round pick Mackenzie Alexander gives the team depth and a future at cornerback.

The team did not address the kicking game this offseason, despite Blair Walsh's costly miss in the postseason. The team probably has one of the best special teams units in the league.

Our Take: The Treadwell selection was popular, but the offensive line additions could prove to be the most valuable of the offseason.

HEAD COACH	SPECIAL TEAMS	DEFENSIVE COORDINATOR	OFFENSIVE COORDINATOR	2015 RECORD

Another year, another title chase. Not much new in New England. The disappointing finish to 2015 is ancient history, and regardless of how Tom Brady's suspension hearing shakes out, one has to think this team is still the cream of the conference. While other contenders are raided each offseason, the Patriots somehow manage to fill their holes as fast as they appear. Case in point: Chris Long. The Rams tossed a number of hefty salaries off their roster, and New England was all too happy to scoop up Long, who is a perfect fit for Bill Belichick's defense. He's smart, experienced and has a good motor. Long helps New England absorb the loss of Chandler Jones, who they traded to Arizona because Jones was a year away from free agent dollars New England wasn't likely to spend. Akiem Hicks was another tough loss. He had his issues, but Hicks was an impact player for much of the year. Terrance Knighton gives the Patriots another thick body in the middle but does not have Hicks' versatility.

New England used two draft choices on offensive guards and added a pair of wide receivers. The team also signed veterans Nate Washington and Chris Hogan. There is little concern over the departure of Brandon LaFell, who caught just half the passes thrown in his direction last year and didn't record a single touchdown. The addition of Martellus Bennett could have the biggest impact of the offseason. Bennett has caught 50 or more balls four straight seasons and will give New England options, as well as insurance for oft-injured Rob Gronkowski.

Our Take: Once again, the sum of what's arriving in New England is greater than what's departing.

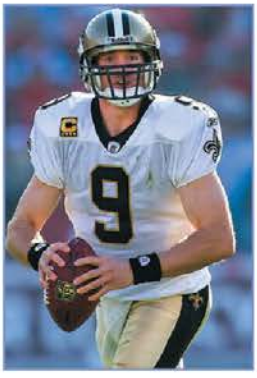
Sean Payton	Greg McMahon	Dennis Allen	Pete Carmichael	7-9-0

You might say the Saints used the offseason to give veteran quarterback Drew Brees the support he needs to end his career with a bang. Ben Watson was a serviceable tight end for New Orleans (74 catches), but Indianapolis cast-off Coby Fleener will be even better.



Fleener has the range and hands to be a lesser version of Jimmy Graham in this offense. The Saints also used a high-round pick on Michael Thomas to restock the receiving corps. The Saints have parted ways with many of the weapons Brees looked to in the past – most recently Marques Colston – so the youth movement was necessary. Brandin Cooks and Willie Snead remain the 1-2 combo, but Thomas has good size to add to the arsenal.

Linebackers Craig Robertson and James Laurinaitis found new homes in the bayou. Laurinaitis was part of the Rams' spring house cleaning, and while his health and age are a concern, his experience and work ethic certainly will be welcome to a unit that allowed a league-worst 4.9 yards per carry last season. And defensive tackle Sheldon Rankins (No. 12 overall pick) will contribute to that effort; he can plug holes and press opposing passers. It's no surprise that two of the team's top-4 picks were used on defensive linemen.

Our Take: The NFC South is stacked, but the Saints did their part this offseason to stay in the mix. Fleener could be fun to watch in this offense.

New York GIANTS

Ben McAdoo	Tom Quinn	Steve Spagnulo	Mike Sullivan	6-10-0

The Giants hope to see a healthy Victor Cruz in 2016 after missing him for more than a year (October 2014). The passing game needs someone to take pressure off of Odell Beckham, and recent losses to the receiving corps – including Rueben Randle's departure this offseason – have thinned out the team's options. New York did use a second-round pick on Sterling Shepard, and may have no choice but to rely on him heavily this season.

Rashad Jennings gained more than 800 yards rushing last season but does not appear to be the firm answer at running back; fifth-round pick Paul Perkins could figure into the mix if Jennings does not dazzle in camp. A balanced attack is the biggest thing holding this team back from contending again for a division title.

On defense, Olivier Vernon and his $85 million deal will replace Robert Ayers upfront, and the team expects Jason Pierre-Paul to be closer to pre-firecracker form this season. The team parted ways with Prince Amukamara, but more than made up for that loss by adding Janoris Jenkins and first-round pick Eli Apple. Those upgrades should help New York improve a pass defense that ranked dead last in yards allowed last season.

Our Take: Many hoped New York would land an impact player for the offense. Instead, the Giants focused their efforts on defense, which should prove a smart play.

Todd Bowles	Brant Boyer	Kacy Rodgers	Chan Gailey	10-6-0

The biggest Jets' story of the offseason was not who the team drafted or who they lost in free agency but the divided locker room caused by the team's handling of Ryan Fitzpatrick's contract. Wide receiver Eric Decker and others made statements in support of Fitzpatrick, who accused the Jets of making a half-hearted contract offer. The team selected Christian Hackenberg in Round 2 and sounded content entering camp with Geno Smith under center (yikes).

The retirement bug found tackle D'Brickashaw Ferguson in April. It caught most by surprise, as Ferguson had built a strong career as an imposing force for the Jets' wall of protection. The team gave up just a fifth-round pick to acquire Ryan Clady, hoping Clady is fully back from the knee injury that prevented him from participating in Denver's title run last year. Clady will help a very good Jets' line protect the quarterback and open holes for free agent pickup Matt Forte.

The Jets were one of 11 defenses to allow fewer than 20 points per game last year. The best player is Muhammad Wilkerson, who broke his leg in the final game of last season. His recovery is the key to this offseason (and the Jets' 2016 playoff hopes). The team used its top draft choice on Ohio State linebacker Darron Lee, and two rounds later added Georgia linebacker Jordan Jenkins. This defense should be very good for many years to come.

Our Take: Losing Ferguson was a shock, and the Fitzpatrick ordeal was foolish. But for the most part this was an offseason of progress for New York.

Oakland is loading up on defense. The team already has one of the league's best young stars in linebacker Khalil Mack (or is he a defensive end??), and last season recruited Aldon Smith, who might just have put his problems behind him (as a Raider, if you can believe that). The team signed former Seattle pass rusher Bruce Irvin and used its second- and third-round picks on defensive end prospects to bring more heat.

The secondary is where the team really made strides this offseason. Veteran Reggie Nelson brings much-needed experience to a unit that gave up 258.7 passing yards a game (26th in the league). His presence should help ease the loss of Charles Woodson. The Raiders used their top draft choice on Karl Joseph, a prospect many compare to Earl Thomas, and added Sean Smith in free agency.

The Raiders spent much of the 2015 offseason addressing the offense, and the successful results allowed the team to stick mostly to the defense this year. The Raiders are happy with Derek Carr's progress and with how Amari Cooper performed in year one. Oakland did pick Michigan State quarterback Connor Cook, possibly because he was too good to pass up in Round 4, but he is no threat to Carr.

Oh, yes, and there was that story of Oakland moving to Las Vegas this offseason, but who has time to pay attention every time the Raiders threaten to pick up and relocate to a new city?

Our Take: Irvin and Joseph should both pay off immediately. Oakland fans can finally smell the playoffs.

Philadelphia EAGLES

Doug Pederson	Dave Fipp	Jim Schwartz	Frank Reich	7-9-0

Chip Kelly didn't last long in Philadelphia. Before he could claim the team his own, owner Jeff Lurie reversed course and sent Kelly packing, opting instead for former Andy Reid protégé Doug Pederson. The switch will have a bigger impact on Philadelphia's 2016 fantasy outlook than any signings or departures. Kelly was shaping a team to his liking, but Pederson's offensive philosophies are much different. Let's first look at quarterback, where the team committed to Sam Bradford, then dealt the farm to trade into the No. 2 spot and select Carson Wentz. That set Bradford off and already Pederson is dealing with a quarterback controversy. Bradford will start the season, but it's unlikely he'll finish it.

The wide receiving corps added veteran depth (Chris Givens and Rueben Randle), and good thing, too, because second-year Nelson Agholor stirred up trouble this offseason. Jordan Matthews appears ready to take another step in his development, but that could be delayed if the quarterback situation gets muddied. No one in Philadelphia is grieving over the loss of DeMarco Murray, but few are confident Ryan Mathews can handle the full load at running back.

There was less mess to clean up on defense because the unit was in such rough shape to begin with. The run defense ranked dead last in 2015. None of this year's additions will help much. The team did add safety Rodney McLeod and veteran CB Leodis McKelvin to try to help shore up a secondary that allowed 267 yards a game last year.

Our Take: This had the sniff of a rebuilding year. Ok, not a sniff but a stench. The team probably gave up too much to get Wentz, and very few of the existing pieces will be relevant by the time Wentz is ready to take the reins.

Mike Tomlin	Danny Smith	Keith Butler	Todd Haley	10-6-0

As far as fantasy owners are concerned, so long as all-world running back Le'Veon Bell returns to full health who cares about the rest. ... Right? Bell was back at practice by mid-spring motivated to be at full strength by the start of camp. Martavis Bryant's suspension is a blow to a passing attack that was becoming nearly impossible to stop. Even without Bryant, the Steelers have the league's top wideout (Antonio Brown) and can lean more heavily on Markus Wheaton. The team added Ladarius Green, who never really got a fair shake in San Diego playing behind Antonio Gates. He is more athletic than Heath Miller (retired) but not as reliable or familiar with this offense. Miller's absence will force Ben Roethlisberger to find short-yardage solutions elsewhere.

Maurkice Pouncey hopes to find the field after suffering a brutal injury a year ago. His presence instantly would make the offensive line better. The Steelers lost Kelvin Beachum in free agency, but spent a fourth-round pick on Jerald Hawkins to pad the depth at tackle.

The Steelers' first three picks were used to help the defense. Cornerback Artie Burns had six interceptions for the Hurricanes last year and could see time alongside second-round selection Sean Davis. Those two hope to cure Pittsburgh's 30th-ranked pass defense from a season ago. The loss of defensive tackle Steve McLendon can be absorbed, especially if project Javon Hargrave has a quick learning curve.

Our Take: Limited casualties and the defensive rebuild went as well as could be expected.

San Diego CHARGERS

Mike McCoy	Craig Aukerman	John Pagano	Ken Whisenhunt	4-12-0

The Chargers surprised everyone when they picked Joey Bosa, one of the most polarizing draft prospects in recent memory. Scouts either love him or hate him (maybe "hate" is too strong a word -- let's just say he has his share of doubters). But San Diego registered just 32 sacks last season, and as much as they may have entertained the notions of other top prospects, Bosa gives them an opportunity to fill a need immediately. Free agent signee Brandon Mebane will provide more beef to San Diego's three-man front.

Casey Hayward will be asked to make plays in the secondary. Hayward was a ball hawk for Green Bay, but only found his way into the starting lineup as an injury fill-in. If he creates turnovers he'll be a wise investment, but San Diego might have to ask him to do more than he is equipped to handle. Long-time safety (and on-field coach) Eric Weddle bolted town, but it was expected as his relationship with the team was strained for much of 2015.

The Chargers picked Hunter Henry to be the heir apparent to Antonio Gates, who stuck around long enough to stall Ladarius Green's career. Green is now a member of the Steelers. Henry could see reps early into the season, as he presents a favorable target in the red zone. The Chargers' most important off-season report was the development of 2015 top pick Melvin Gordon, who crashed and burned in his first year. Philip Rivers desperately needs run support to allow him to operate his passing attack most efficiently.

Our Take: The sound you hear is the collective yawn from Chargers fans, who are prepared to challenge for the basement of the division race.

Chip Kelly	Derius Swinton	Jim O'Neil	Curtis Modkins	5-11-0

Is there a better fit for Chip Kelly than San Francisco -- the team that imploded because (as rumors have it) Jim Harbaugh needed too much control? Here we go again. Well, maybe the York family learned from its mistake and has softened. Or maybe the brief Jim Tomsula era was too painful to bear. Whatever the reason, the team will rebuild again.

The offseason began with sparks over Colin Kaepernick's unhappiness. One would think Kaepernick and Kelly to be a perfect union, but it wasn't until late spring that Kaepernick came around to the idea. Now the two appear ready to make it work. It will be without possession receiver Anquan Boldin and tight end Vernon Davis. Boldin was a safety net for the passing game, a role the team hopes it can fill with one of its young receivers. The offensive line -- once the strength of this side of the ball -- lost another pillar (Alex Boone) but used the second of its two first-round picks on a guard, and then added depth at tackle with a pair of fifth-round picks.

The 49ers' top draft choice, defensive end DeForest Buckner, had 9.5 sacks for Oregon last year. San Francisco was once loaded in that department but now desperately needs more bodies to pressure opposing quarterbacks (the team ranked 29th in that category in 2015). The 49ers did invest three draft picks to improve the secondary. The team can still count on its linebacking corps -- one of the NFC's best -- but needs its young players to make fast progress.

Our Take: Kelly is a good coach, no matter what anyone says; it's just a question of whether this is a good fit. We think so.

Seattle SEAHAWKS

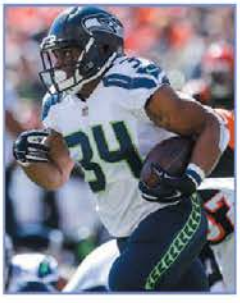
Pete Carroll	Brian Schneider	Kris Richard	Darrell Bevell	10-6-0

Running back Marshawn Lynch was a liability last year, even when healthy, and while everyone would agree the team would rather have him in the lineup, no one in Seattle will miss the distractions. Thomas Rawls averaged almost two yards more per carry last year than Lynch, but he spent much of the offseason hobbled, and there are serious concerns as to whether he can be in top form for Week 1. For this reason the Seahawks spent two picks on the backfield.



Another concern this offseason was tight end Jimmy Graham's recovery. He never fully adapted to the offense last season, but the team would be far more dynamic if Graham can return to full health. If not, the Seahawks have Luke Willson and third-round draft choice Nick Vannett. The team did re-sign Jermaine Kearse this offseason and hope Doug Baldwin can come close to matching his 2015 production. That would help quarterback Russell Wilson feel more at ease, especially after the departures of a pair of offensive linemen (they hope top pick Germaine Ifedi can replace tackle Russell Okung).

Bruce Irvin was a slight disappointment after his 2012 rookie season, but he's still a hole to fill, even for a front seven as loaded as Seattle. The team also lost defensive tackle Brandon Mebane but picked up Jarran Reed in Round 2 of the 2016 NFL Draft, and later added another defensive tackle in Round 5. That is what Seattle has done better than any other club in the past several years -- restock.

Our Take: When you're at or near the top the other teams pick from your roster. The Seahawks did all they could to replace Lynch and the other significant losses.

Tampa Bay BUCCANEERS

Dirk Koetter	Nate Kaczor	Mike Smith	Todd Monken	6-10-0

The Buccaneers have little patience for progress. Lovie Smith showed signs of growth but didn't move fast enough for management, so the team made a change to Dirk Koetter. He is quite familiar with this division from the three years he spent as Atlanta's offensive coordinator.

Making life easy on Koetter is the fact that the Buccaneers defense is special. The team already had Gerald McCoy and Jacquies Smith upfront and signed Robert Ayers to bring more heat on opposing passers. It's almost unfair. Lavonte Davis has blossomed as a good all-around linebacker and Tampa Bay bolstered the secondary by using its top pick on Vernon Hargreaves III and signing Brent Grimes (which also means the team inherits social media siren Miko Grimes). The team allowed few yards last season, especially against the run, but far too many points. That will change in 2016.

Offensively, the Buccaneers made a larger financial commitment to running back Doug Martin and spent much of the offseason praising young quarterback Jameis Winston's development. He still has a pair of towers to throw to (Vincent Jackson and Mike Evans) but the team hopes to see others emerge, especially since Jackson is now 33. Running back Charles Sims was second on the club in catches last season (51) and Tampa Bay can't afford to be so thin in the passing game this year if it's to make strides in the division race.

Our Take: Adding Ayers to the front line and all the secondary upgrades should show immediate results.

Mike Mularkey	Bobby April	Dick LeBeau	Terry Robiskie	3-13-0

Mike Mularkey wants to run the football. It's a statement printed in large letters on the side of Nissan Stadium and taped above every urinal in the building. Fine, ok, those are lies, but you get the point. ... The Titans' coach is old school and unforgiving when it comes to running the football. The Titans have the quarterback for the job (2015 top pick Marcus Mariota) and this offseason brought in 2014 rushing champ DeMarco Murray and second-round bruiser Derrick Henry to further emphasize Mularkey's commitment. This team is going to pound and pound and pound. Murray may be a bigger risk than Henry and not just because of his salary. His confidence is a factor after a wasted season in Philadelphia, and Henry (wrongly-labeled a short-yardage option) could steal the thunder in camp. The Titans' coaching staff seems open to either option. Adding center Ben Jones and first-round tackle Jack Conklin also express Mularkey's commitment to winning upfront. The team lost multi-spot lineman Byron Bell to an off-season injury, but the Titans' line depth should help neutralize that setback.

The loss of veteran safety Michael Griffin was a blow to one of the league's least tolerable secondaries. The Titans hoped to improve their front seven this offseason, and possibly find an impact pass rusher (no Tennessee defender had more than seven sacks in 2015). Second-round pick Kevin Dodd had eight sacks for Clemson but isn't what fans had in mind.

Our Take: The Titans stuck to their game plan, and Murray and Henry make this offseason one fans should be happy about.

Jay Gruden	Ben Kotwica	Joe Barry	Sean McVay	9-7-0

The reigning NFC East champion Redskins focused their offseason on solidifying the quarterback position. Robert Griffin III had to go, and the team had no choice but to double down on Kirk Cousins. Time will tell if either move proves a mistake. Cousins had 29 touchdowns and more than 4,000 yards last year -- you gotta like that! -- and was rewarded with a first-round wide receiver. Josh Doctson could be the toast of the wide receiver draft class. He's athletic and should press Pierre Garcon and Desean Jackson for reps. Tight end Vernon Davis was signed this offseason but his best days are long gone and the Redskins are already in good hands with Jordan Reed. The team parted with back Alfred Morris, who logged a lot of miles and showed the wear last season.

On defense, Washington went all in to upgrade the secondary. When the Panthers allowed Josh Norman to test the market, the Redskins scooped him up, landing arguably one of the best cover corners in the game. Washington also used its second and third round picks on secondary help. Safety Su'a Cravens and CB Kendall Fuller will both see lots of snaps this year for a unit that surrendered 30 touchdown passes and an average of 7.8 yards per attempt last season. Big body Terrance Knighton was recruited by New England, so Washington picked up Matt Ioannidis in the draft. The defensive front seven remains a concern, however.

Our Take: Norman could be huge, and Doctson could make a splash in year 1.

NOTES

The option week should be skipped if your league wants to avoid the dreaded Week 17 of the NFL. Typically, many NFL teams rest players either all game or a significant part of it in order to rest for the playoffs. So, by skipping the option week in the schedule you will avoid Week 17.

You can still play Week 17 by allowing managers to create a starting lineup from all NFL players. Just for fun of, course. The challenge would be which manager could make the best lineup. You could make a special award for the manager who scores the most points.

12-Manager League - The schedule for the 12-manager league has a playoff option and a non-playoff option for those who want to play straight through.

THE DEFENSE (NEVER) RESTS:

Finding Success in IDP Fantasy Football Leagues

By Gary Davenport, IDP Senior Staff Writer, Fantasy Sharks

The Denver Broncos didn't win Super Bowl 50 because of their offense. Sure, the team has a great wide receiver tandem in Emmanuel Sanders and Demaryius Thomas, but Peyton Manning alternated between serviceable and awful in 2015. The run game was erratic, too.

No, the Broncos won the Super Bowl because of linebacker Von Miller, cornerback Aqib Talib, coordinator Wade Phillips and the NFL's best defense. It may sound cliché, but it's as true now as ever – defense wins championships.

And that makes it all the more mind-bending that defense is an afterthought in many fantasy football leagues. You pick a team defense late in your draft, they score you a handful of points each week, and the moment they even appear to falter it's off to the scrap heap they go.

However, if you're reading this you're at least considering righting that injustice. Restoring order and balance to the universe.

You're playing in a league that uses Individual Defensive Players. Giving the defense their due. Adding a whole new dimension to the fantasy football experience.

And whether this is your first IDP league or your 31st, here are some tips and players to bear in mind as draft day nears.

TIP: KNOW YOUR SCORING!

It seems like a no-brainer, but it never ceases to amaze me how many IDP owners tank their seasons right out of the gate by not understanding their league's scoring and roster requirements.

How do the top scoring IDPs fare relative to their offensive counterparts? If the top defensive players score on par with a WR3, that's one thing. If they score on par with a WR1, that's another altogether.

Does your league start only a few IDPs or a full defensive lineup? The more your league tilts toward the former the longer you can wait to draft defenders. But if your league starts several IDPs, hesitate too long and the player pool could run dry.

It's also vital to know what type of IDP league you're in scoring-wise, which can be determined by examining the ratio between solo tackles and "big plays" (sacks, interceptions, etc.)

If that ratio is less than 3-to-1 (say tackles are worth 1.5 points and sacks are worth 4) then you're in a tackle-heavy IDP league. In that format high-volume "tackle vacuums" like Indianapolis Colts linebacker D'Qwell Jackson rule the roost.

If the ratio is greater than 4-to-1 (say tackles are worth 1 point and sacks are worth 5), then you are playing in a big play-heavy format. In those leagues rush linebackers like Miller and cornerbacks like Talib who rack up interceptions get a value boost.

Then there are balanced IDP leagues, where the ratio falls between 3-to-1 and 4-to-1. In those leagues the safer bet is to lean toward the high-tackle types, but mixing in a high-upside sack artist can make for some huge weekly scores.

For the purpose of this article, we're going to work under two assumptions. The first is a scoring format that is the tackle-heavy side of balanced (a ratio of about 3-to-1 between stops and big plays). The second is a defensive lineup that calls for two defensive linemen, two linebackers, two defensive backs and a "flex" spot. The majority of IDP leagues feature similar scoring and lineup requirements.

TIP: HOLD THE LINE

Along the defensive front, the name of the game is scarcity. There just aren't that many truly reliable weekly fantasy options – a dozen or so, tops. And assuming that your IDP league starts at least two players at the position that means someone is going to get left out in the cold.

Don't be that team. Be prepared to spend an early IDP pick on at least one defensive lineman you can plug in with confidence on a weekly basis. Ideally the plan is to pair a high-floor option like Calais Campbell of the Arizona Cardinals (who makes up for relatively low sack numbers with strong tackle production) with an upside play like Jason Pierre-Paul of the New York Giants or Brandon Graham of the Philadelphia Eagles – a player you hope will tally 12+ sacks on the season.

The king of the defensive linemen (and the top IDP overall) is unquestionably J.J. Watt of the Houston Texans. There isn't a position on offense or defense where the gap between No. 1 and No. 2 is as wide as the canyon separating Watt and every defensive lineman who isn't him. In the Deathmatch IDP league at Fantasy Sharks, Watt outscored the runner-up on the DL (Ezekiel Ansah of the Detroit Lions) by five fantasy points per game in 2015.

But if you want Watt he's going to cost you. In fact, if your league offers IDPs any real weight Watt is well worth consideration with the first overall pick. If you can somehow land him in any round that isn't the first, pull the trigger without hesitation. You just committed robbery.

SLEEPER: Mario Williams – DE, Miami Dolphins: After a disastrous 2015 season that led to his departure from Buffalo, Dolphins DC Vance Joseph told the team's website Williams is eager to recapture his "Super Mario" form. "Mario, in my opinion, he's motivated," Joseph said. "When he's motivated, he's pretty good." Prior to last year the 31-year-old Williams had posted three straight top-15 seasons. Not bad for a player with an early ADP at My Fantasy League of DL25.

SLEEPER: Rob Ninkovich – DE, New England Patriots: Another veteran player whose numbers were down in 2015, Ninkovich is a prime example of the high-floor fantasy option on the DL I mentioned. All Ninkovich has to do to provide fantasy owners with great value as a DL2 available for a DL3 price tag is match last year's "disappointing" production. With Chandler Jones now in Arizona and Nink set for a bigger snap count in 2016, odds are he does even better.

TIP: LOAD UP AT LINEBACKER

In the overwhelming majority of IDP leagues, linebackers form the foundation of your defensive unit. Not only are they often the highest-scoring defensive players (especially in tackle-heavy systems), but they are easily the most consistent.

Given that, as well as the fact that nine times out of 10 the "flex" spot in IDP leagues are going to be filled with a linebacker, the position should be an early priority for fantasy owners. A good rule of thumb for novice IDP drafters is this – two of you first three defensive picks should be linebackers, with the third selection being one of those dependable defensive linemen I mentioned. The order might vary, but whether it's LB/LB/DL, DL/LB/LB or LB/DL/LB it's a trio that will provide a good base for your defense.

So when is it time to start drafting IDPs? Well, given the varying lineup requirements, scoring systems and the vagaries of individual leagues, that's a loaded question. The easy answer is this – if you're new to IDP let the first few players come off the board before you worry about addressing that side of the ball. Sure, it's nice to have Carolina Panthers linebacker Luke Kuechly on your squad, but the earth won't split in two if you don't.

SLEEPER: Jordan Hicks – MLB, Philadelphia Eagles: The Eagles thought enough of Hicks' play as a rookie to trade away Kiko Alonso in the offseason, and the youngster told Philly.com he's determined not to let new DC Jim Schwartz down. "I've always been one when I've been on the field to take control naturally," Hicks said. "It's just the position I've always put myself in and felt comfortable taking on." There's top-10 upside to be had here with a player coming off the board in mid-range LB2 territory.

SLEEPER: Kiko Alonso – MLB, Miami Dolphins: Speaking of Alonso, the 25-year-old now finds himself on his third team in as many years and recovering from his second torn ACL. Durability is a very real concern, but he told the team's website he's healthy entering 2016. "I'm just trying to just keep improving and get back to myself," Alonso said. The fourth-year veteran has shown the ability to produce like an elite fantasy option, and with an ADP of LB40 Alonso's knee is well worth a roll of the dice.

TIP: DIME A DOZEN

In 2015, Miami Dolphins strong safety Reshad Jones rode 106 solo tackles (second in the NFL) to the top finish among all defensive players in most scoring systems. That may make what I'm about to tell you seem a little odd.

You don't want any part of having Jones on your fantasy team in 2016. Or any "elite" defensive back, for that matter.

From an IDP standpoint, defensive backs are two things. The first is unpredictable – the number of people who pegged Jones for that top finish last year numbers exactly zero. The top 10 to end each season almost always looks nothing like the "experts" predictions.

The second thing defensive backs are is plentiful. There will absolutely be high-end DBs who will fall flat on their faces – and they will be easily replaced by the handful of defensive backs who come from nowhere to emerge as weekly fantasy starters.

The strategy then in the secondary is easy – wait to draft defensive backs. And then wait. And then wait some more. Use that draft capital on other positions. Grab upside plays late. And if they don't pan out, who cares? There will be plenty of low-hanging fruit on the waiver wire.

SLEEPER: Ibraheim Campbell – SS, Cleveland Browns: Campbell told Cleveland.com he's ready for his turn in the starting lineup in 2016. "One thing that I learned early on in this league is you have to be ready for any opportunity that you get and take full advantage of it," Campbell said, "so I always made sure that I was prepared to step in to a starting role whenever I had to." IDP owners should be ready for the youngster to rack up stops at the back end of a Cleveland defense that's going to be spending a ton of time on the field this year.

SLEEPER: Clayton Geathers – SS, Indianapolis Colts: Like Campbell, Geathers is a young safety being asked to take on a much larger role in 2016. Head coach Chuck Pagano told ESPN he likes what he's seen from the second-year pro in camp. "Clayton is doing a great job and he's communicating really well back there with Mike," Pagano said. "He doesn't make mental errors. He's a very conscientious guy, and he's a talented guy. He's gotten himself in really good shape, looks faster, looks rangier, twitchier. He's making nice plays." A poster child for waiting at the position – loads of upside available on the cheap.
